Small Fruits and Land Development.

One of the greatest resources in the state of Oregon and particularly the Willamette valley, is the small fruit industry, particularly loganberries and strawberries. Soil and climate conditions, are perfect for these fruits which are the backbone of the jelly, jam, preserve and canning industry for world markets.

A few years ago loganberries were unsaleable, due to over-production on the one hand and an extremely limited market on the other. It was not until an organized effort was made to convert the loganberry into a fruit juice, backed by a nationwide campaign of advertising such as the Phez company inaugurated at an expense of $100,000 per annum, that this most delicious fruit come into its own. Today the supply of loganberries is totally inadequate to meet the demand.

Just so with the strawberry. The price for a period of 10 years ranged around 4½ cents per pound. In 1919 the market opened at 10 cents per pound and closed at 12 cents per pound. Fruit preserving and canning, coupled with an advertising campaign captured world markets and today the manufacturing end of the fruit industry is being retarded through lack of the necessary acreage to justify the establishment of more manufacturing plants. That is what industry does for agricultural development, it creates a market for the farmer and all should join in the campaign for increased production.

It will be impossible to overdo the small fruit industry. Stocks are down to bedrock, likewise the existing acreage. Growers can make contracts for long periods at prices which will show a net profit of all the way from $150 to $200 an acre, which means 10 per cent on land values of $1500 and $2000 an acre.

Summing it up, small fruits mean more factories, bigger payrolls, increased population, enhanced property valuations and splendid profits to the man who follows the cultivator and the plow.—The Manufacturer.

The Principle Involved.

The American people struggled for a quarter of a century to bring capital into subjection to the rights of the public. They have defeated the efforts of capital to dictate. They now face an effort at dictation in the name of labor, which is as contemptuous of the rights of the public as capital was formerly. The spirit of the oft-quoted "public be damned" epigram is just as apparent in the present conduct of labor as it was formerly in that of capital. The public is just as determined not to be damned by labor as it was not to be damned by capital. When labor comes with a threat to tie up the railroads, to extinguish the steel furnaces and to cut off the fuel supply with winter at hand unless its demands are conceded, the people recognize it as an attempt to hold up the United States, and they will fight.

In taking this attitude the people do not oppose labor unions as such. They oppose only a leadership with revolutionary aims and contempt of contracts. They are no more desirous of breaking up organizations of labor than they were of breaking up corporations when capital became arrogant.

The protest is against the effort of any class, any minority, to ride roughshod over the whole nation in assertion of its pretended rights and in contempt of the rights of the majority. Within those limitations there is abundant room for the activity of labor unions.

A non-union laborer and American citizen has just as much right to a job as a union man who is or is not a citizen, and visa versa.

The "closed shop" theory is contrary to every principle of our form of government and is just as contrary to our American guarantee of individual rights and liberty, as would be the recognition of a principle in America that a man had to belong to a specified church or lodge before he was given a job.—The Manufacturer.

The 7th and 8th grade pupils of Mrs. Boswell, had a masquerade party at the J. W. Reed home last Friday night. Ted Saling won the prize for the best costume. He dressed like a girl and made a very pretty one.

The Red Cross button is the most widely worn button in the world. Thirty million men and women and children in the United States now wear this emblem of countless good deeds accomplished. For the third year in America comes universal opportunity to wear it.

There are many instances of how this button, bearing upon a white background a tiny cross, has been worn and treasured. One morning in a distant northwest county, a man whose ruddy, optimistic countenance was clothed with ruddy beard, asked the Red Cross chairman if he had another button like the one he wore. The chairman gave him his own. "I have twelve children," explained the man. "I gave my button to the twelfth, a new arrival, this morning. When I have anything good the whole family must come in on it."
