The Aftermath.

The kindergarten teacher had made the children an impressive talk on the danger of playing in the street. But one little boy did not take warning. An automobile struck him, bruising him slightly. For two days he was out of school; the third day he came back, only to hear the teacher begin another talk on the dangers of the street. This time she used him as "the horrible example."

"Just think, children, if Johnny had been killed how much we would have hated it. He never could come to us and we would have," she was going to say, "to do without his companionship."

But the freckled little boy finished it for her.

"We would have to buy some flowers," he yelled.

Imaginary Cheer.

It was a fashionable bridge luncheon.

"Have you a strong imagination?" asked the hostess.

Every lady said she had.

"Just imagine, then, that you are drinking a cocktail. It will do you quite as much good and there won't be any bad after effects."—Louisville Courier-Journal.

The Reason.

"I see where the entente are considering cutting up Turkey."

"Well, why not? This is the entente's thanksgiving day."
