Leadership of the Press

Newspapers are slowly awakening to their great responsibility in leadership in all public matters.

With a direct vote in the hands of the people at primaries and elections readers of papers become dynamic.

The days of the political boss and of the party ring to dictate are matters of past political history.

The people are ready to act intelligently only when fairly well informed on the issues involved.

That information is not gathered just before election from flaming campaign circulars or selfish appeals.

It is gathered by the newspaper readers in the quiet of their homes and their action is what finally counts.
