The Presidential Message

"In the existing league of nations, the world governing with its super-powers, this republic will have no part."

With these words President Harding definitely rejected the league of nations. He favors a declaration of peace, and afterwards seek to negotiate "the covenant relationships so essential to all. This position is what might have been expected from his previous utterances. Those who will be disappointed at the scrapping of the covenant, may console themselves that its main purpose may be attained in other ways, if covenant relationships are entered into for the promotion of peace. As to disarmament, he is ready to co-operate with other nations, but points out it would be folly for the U. S. to disarm alone.

His domestic policies are such as commend themselves as practical and sane, among which are relief for agriculture and the establishment of a large mercantile marine.

Two statements deserve careful attention, which are:

"Labor must join management in understanding that the public which pays is the public to be served and simple justice is the right of all people."

"Congress ought to wipe the stain of barbaric lynching from the banners of a free and orderly representative democracy."

He also gives the senate to understand that he knows his prerogatives in foreign policies and will not allow it to usurp them. Altogether the message is most reassuring.

Tragic

The death of the former empress of Germany, in exile at Doorn, Holland, which occurred Monday morning, is full of pathos. How different from what she expected when she married Prince William of Prussia, in 1881, forty years ago. It is probable that she had little to do with politics, but confined herself to the domain of "the church, nursery and kitchen," as her husband once expressed it. The war even when victory seemingly was going to the Germans, must have been a severe strain on her, and when the German collapse came, and she had to flee hurriedly from Berlin, it must have been a heart rending experience. Poor woman, death must have brought her a welcome release. After life's fitful fever, may she rest in peace.

Col. Harvey, editor of Harvey's Weekly, and the great adversary of Woodrow Wilson in the last Presidential campaign, is to be ambassador at the Court of St. James, if his nomination is confirmed. A possible embarrassment might ensue if Woodrow Wilson should visit London while Col. Harvey is ambassador. The former could not well avoid making a call on his country's chief representative, and the latter would feel it incumbent on him to show special courtesy to a former President. To those who know the strained relations between the two, it would be amusing to watch their official smiles when they met.
