Two Stills Taken

Last Monday Sheriff Wilson, accompanied by deputies High and Milt Marshall, went out on a still hunting trip. They found a trail seven miles southeast of town in Upper Garfield. They found a complete still, 450 gallons of mash and a large quantity of the finished product in the midst of a veritable jungle, so thick, according to the sheriff, that one might have passed by ten feet from where it stood, while the still was in operation and not have noticed it. No men were found in the vicinity of the still, but the moonshine manufacturing plant was in perfect condition and ready for operation. Sheriff Wilson proclaimed it one of the most complete and efficient outfits he had ever had the pleasure to destroy. The outfit was completely wrecked. No one connected with the still was found.

The officers then proceeded to the Dodge district, where another still was found on the farm of George Neviland. A 100 gallon barrel of mash was confiscated with the still. Neviland was arrested and taken to Oregon City, where he was released on a $500 bail.

Both of the above stills were brought to Estacada and placed in the window of S. E. Wooster's office, where they have attracted much attention.

The same day another still was captured and its owner arrested, by officer C. J. Long and three federal men, near Damascus. The sheriff and his deputies deserve the highest credit for their zeal and success in stamping out the moonshine traffic.
