Tucker's Last Story.

The story that George Loane Tucker was working on when he died, and which he hoped would be a successor of "The Miracle Man," is Tom Meighan's new Paramount picture, "If You Believe It, It's So," which will be shown at the Gem theater tonight and Friday.

The purchase of this story was in line with the Paramount's policy of getting only the biggest stories and plays for Mr. Meighan. Tom Forman directed "If You Believe It, It's So." George Loane Tucker had selected this story as his next production and had started on the scenario when his untimely death occurred. and Estacada was played, which proved very exciting, and was won by the visitors with a score of 8 to 6. The American Legion dance at night in the pavilion, proved a most popular climax to the entertainment of the day.

There must have been several thousand in attendance, who all seemed to enjoy themselves, and the spirit of goodfellowship was marked. The occasion may be considered a huge success. The receipts will pay all expenses and leave a substantial surplus for the benefit of the town library.

The band is entitled to the highest praise, and steps should be taken to insure its retention as a permanent institution.
