The Potato Outlook

While there was a shortage of crop in the three coast states last year, there was a large crop of potatoes in the country generally, and the coast production is but a small factor in production. Potatoes are being shipped into Oregon now from as far east as Minnesota, and from any locality where the freight rate is not prohibitive. From the general outlook it would seem that prices would not be better than at present, and that holding for better prices is not warranted. The stock on hand in the whole country in January was sixteen million bushels greater than at the same time a year ago.

Beats the Kansas Record

In the market bulletin of February 26 was a brief description of a combine harvester used in Kansas and Oklahoma which harvests a carload of wheat per day. G. R. Hyslop, farm crop specialist of the Oregon Agricultural College, read the item and wrote the following concerning it:

"While Oregon has been using the combined harvester for many years with pronounced success, I ran across an instance last summer that I think has the Kansas record backed clear off the map. Sam Culley of Weston, Oregon, with a combine harvester, tractor drawn, harvested 250 acres of Federation wheat that went 55 bushels to the acre, in five days. This is approximately 2750 bushels a day. The remarkable part of it was that the machine was operated with three men, one the tractor driver, one the separator engineer and header tender and the other the separator elevator direct from the machine tender. The grain was hauled to the elevator direct from the machine with six wagons.
