PATRIOTISM
The picture, "The Man Without a Country" to be shown at the Gem theatre, Friday, April 24, under the auspices of the Carl Douglas Post of the American Legion, is a remarkable sermon on the text, patriotism. Those of us who read the story many years ago—a story which is wholly imaginary—have never forgotten it. But many of the younger generation have never read it, perhaps never heard of it, and to such the portrayal of it must and will be impressive. It is worth much to have a great past thus made to live again. There are, it is to be hoped, not many people who if they could get a realizing sense of what this country cost, would ever be false to it. This picture shows something of the toils and sacrifices that great and good men made that this country might live.

But there are many kinds of patriotism, as there are many kinds of treason. The sermon is directed—or should be thought of as directed—not simply against the Bolsheviks, the radical Socialists, the slacker. It has a much wider application. Those who are familiar at all with the history of this nation ought to be wholly incapable of grafting on it, or ever subordinating patriotism to partian-ship. The man who looks on this government as a great fount of privilege, and who thinks of it as something out of which money is to be made, is as much in need of the sermon of "The Man Without a Country" as is every other kind of a traitor.

This nation was not born and has not endured that it might go down to ruin at the hands of men who scorn idealism and sneer at patriotism. That is the moral of this presentation of a great past, this portrayal of great men and great events. The story was written in the midsts of the terrible struggle for national unity a half century ago. It is timely today, as much so as it was then.

Last Friday afternoon the Websterian society gave a program, one of the best this year. The different numbers were a piano solo by Ardine Byers, a guitar duet by Ruth Day and Avis Cadonau and a "mock wedding" by the Websterian boys and girls. This last was much enjoyed, Mary Alice Reed made a very laughable negro parson; Myrtle Hall, the "blushing bride" and John Whitaker, the groom.

The Freshmen also gave their program on Friday in the English room. Their program consisted of five recitations.

On Thursday, Mr. Stephens gave the last of his series of banking talks. His talk was on the Federal Reserve System. In this talk he gave the non-elasticity of currency as the reason for panics. He also told of the plan used to avert the panic of 1907, which was the issuance of clearing house certificates. He explained the Canadian, English and American systems of Federal Reserve banking. These talks have been largely enjoyed by the students and we are glad that Mr. Stephens has seen fit to give us his time to explain the banking system as he has done so capably.

The second game of the baseball season was played at Canby on Friday afternoon. Although the day was rainy the home team won by a score of 12 to 4. The next game will be at Gresham on Wednesday, April 22. On Friday, April 24, Oregon City plays at Estacada.

A rally was held Friday morning to give the boys a send-off for the afternoon's game. A great deal of pep was displayed at this meeting and it is hoped that we can do as well every time we have a rally.
