INVESTORS AND OREGON.

Taxes in Oregon are high. It may not be practicable to reduce them materially, so long as people demand governmental activities for which they must pay, but it is undoubtedly possible to hold them at the present level, and the sooner legislatures, county courts, cities and towns and districts of various kinds realize it, the better for the home owners and the state itself.
Oregon needs more people. It should encourage those who have money to invest to come here, with the object of increasing our population and spreading the tax burden, automatically reducing the per capita cost of government. Investors from other sections are going to look us over carefully, however, and if our taxes mount unreasonably high, they will seek shelter elsewhere.
There is nothing particularly new or original in these statements. They have been uttered before, but it is well to reiterate them, to serve as a warning to voters of this state who are bound to be urged to vote funds for this and that scheme at the next election.
We believe the people of Oregon are done with paternalism and that they will discourage impracticable and fanciful ideas which are frequently found in the platforms of candidates. It has been said that planks were made to ride on, but we apprehend that those aspirants who trot out a plank entailing large expenditures of the people's money are due for a rough ride.
Chief among the visions which are already being proposed on public platforms is the proposal to authorize a bond issue of forty million dollars to put the state into the hydro-electric business. The scheme is pure state ownership and operation, nothing less. It will entail greater expenditures than now proposed. It will mean political administration, which usually spells inefficiency. It will put the state into competition with concerns which now pay a heavy percentage of the taxes in cities and counties, and it will cost the taxpayers sums which cannot even be calculated.
Political remedies are never economic. They are always unsound. But they must be watched with unceasing vigilance by the people who will have to pay the piper.
Go to Linn's Inn for the Oregonian, it is the authorized agent of the paper.

LOCAL NEWS

Those present were Mesdames Allen, Currin, Ewalt, Sparks, Ed. Linn, R. H. Carter, Gerald Wilcox and the hostess.

Producers Unsed Power.

All lines of business are merging, enlarging—giant combinations are daily forming. Agricultural organizations do not keep a balance. With a few outstanding exceptions control of both buying and selling of agricultural products is in the hands of others. Agriculture could have the most powerful organization in the United States if producers would but follow the lines of big business.
