Wallace McCammant

The political history of Oregon would be incomplete that did not mention Wallace McCammant. He has trod up and down the length and breadth of this commonwealth; and has received almost as much from page publicity as George (Feaning Portland's Mayor). It is not the purpose of this article to delve far back into the gradual rise, politically, of this astute young man—at least not further than the period when he was returning from a successful campaign for a political campaign fund among the constituted political bosses of the several met the train upon which he was riding and a friend generous, bought two copies and tendered on to the honorable young man, only to learn that he disapproved of the Sunday Oregonian through conscientious scruples, though a great admirer of its editor, Harvey Scott and the week-day editions.

His elevation to the Supreme Bench of the state followed, not only as a tribute to his mental accomplishments, but as quid pro quo for his political services.

This brings us down to the date when he stood before the electors of this state as a candidate for the honor of Delegate to the Republic

National Convention. In his prospectus, or rather his statement to the voters of his party he set forth in black and white his refusal to pledge himself to support any particular candidate as the nominee for the office of president. He alleged that his reasons for so doing were so that he might be free to support that candidate whom the people in their wisdom might select at the primaries.

Upon that promise, the electors, well knowing his conscientious scruples, and believing in his pre-election promises, which induced them to vote for him, proceeded to elect him delegate, and at the same time voted for the Hon. Hiram Johnson of California, as their choice for the office of president of the United States. The number of votes cast, the percentage of the whole number who voted is immaterial, as all of the voters—all of the Republicans, had an equal opportunity to vote. There is no claim that anyone was disfranchised. The will of the people was pressed at the polls, and the slacker and their great champion—"The Wallace McCammant for refusing to support his promise to the people support their candidate for the office of president, by claiming that the slacker who were in the majority would not have voted for Hiram Johnson as their choice of those who exercised their choice of franchise at the polls, the great champion of the slacker would never have taken up the defense of those who had not voted—no matter how few votes were polled, but would, to suit the occasion, taken the position, that those who voted represented the will of those who did not.

Having had its bump of ego, caused by its own idea of its influence in the community, reduced by the vote for Hiram Johnson, as against its candidate, The Oregonian exhibits its yellow streak and whines that the votes cast did not represent the will of the people. When, then, may we ask, do the votes cast represent the will of the people? Can it be that we are lacking in intelligence? Or is it the settled law of this commonwealth that such votes represent the will of the people, and when cast for candidates or measures supported by the Oregonian?

Wallace McCammant betrayed the trust of his constituents—and for that reason senator Hiram Johnson is trying to prevent the senate from confirming President Coolidge's appointment of McCammant to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals Bench. Needless to say, this appointment was for services rendered by Wallace McCammant in nominating Coolidge for Vice-president. Politics as she is played knows no code of ethics or honor—such codes being thrown in the scrap heap—or wiped out through moral bankruptcy.

(Wallace McCammant's appointment has not been confirmed at this writing, but hangs in the balance, awaiting his personal appearance and defense before the senate.)

In the arena of republican politics in Oregon each week finds Frederick W. Steiwer, of Pendleton gaining more and more ground in his candidacy for United States senator. Impetus was added to the Steiwer campaign during the past two weeks when State Senator R. R. Butler, of The Dalles pledged his active support to Mr. Steiwer.

Senator Butler who for some time harbored a desire to get into the senatorial race, announced that he looks upon Steiwer as the strongest and the best qualified contender for the nomination. Senator Butler it a recognized leader in the dry element in the state and will add considerable to the Steiwer campaign.

The situation in Multnomah county is very favorable so far as Mr. Steiwer is concerned. Political leaders are more or less disgusted with the fact that there are a half dozen or more active or receptive Multnomah candidates, and predict that the eastern Oregon man will carry their county.

They do not believe that Stanfield could be elected if nominated, and they hold that the one man who has the ability and the potential strength necessary to win is Mr. Steiwer.

Eastern Oregon politicians are predicting that Steiwer will poll a vote of two to one over Stanfield from the eastern line of the state to Troutdale.

Coolidge on Tariff

Washington, Jan. 16. (Washington Bureau of the Journal)—"The president, under his peculiar views as to the conduct of independent commissions of the government, is, in my judgement, violating the laws of the land," declared Senator Norris of Nebraska, Republican, in a speech today on presidential influence in the tariff commission.

"If the shipping board and other boards are to be controlled by secret understandings, we may as well abolish them," Senator Norris continued. "Are there any judges who have placed their resignations in the hands of the president to be accepted when desired?"

"Is the understanding which the president claims he had with commissioner Haney of the shipping board common to other departments of the government?"

Senator Norris said he would add another chapter to his remarks later.

The Double Standard

A perplexed young woman is worried about "the double standard of morals," she can see nothing fair in a system which allows certain privileges to men and forbids them to women.

And she has plenty of company, for a good many women spend a lot of time thinking the same thing about the same question.

Pagan and Christian civilizations have had the double standard because the men found it convenient to establish it and, having had the balance of power for centuries, were able to keep women subjected to the same idea.

The modern woman questions this injustice more openly and loudly than any of her predecessors. Having acquired new privileges she dallies with the thought that all the forbidden fruit which men have tasted and now taste should be pressed also to her lips.

And in so doing she dallies with the thought which may destroy her.

For, in the last analysis, we had much better have the double standard, unjust as it is, than to have women, in order to "get even" think they can tread the primrose path with impunity.

For immorality reacts chiefly upon the individual. It may not be, as many people now argue, a sin against God, but it is without doubt a sin against yourself, and no person, whether man or woman, indulges in a life without paying a price that is high.

We women have been wont to believe that the man can do this and "get by," and once they may have done so, but they can do this no more. They pay, and in precious coin, for every evil deed, for every sensual indulgence, for every indecent, unmanly act. They pay in the loss of their children's faith, in the destruction of their wife's love, in the death of their friend's respect, and in the bitter knowledge that they have polluted their bodies and atrophied their souls, and in return have gained—nothing.

Decency, clean living, wholesome thinking, are worth a thousand times more than anything else in life than anything else in life. To women, they are of inestimable value.

Do not doubt that the pure in heart see God. For while the unclean creep about in the mud and mire of their own viciousness, these others walk serenely with their faces toward the stars.—Portland News.

New Standards

For centuries the human race has paid homage to Venus and Adonis as the embodiment of female and male physical perfection.

Now they have critics. In plain, 20th century slang, "they're out." Americans of the future, says Dr. Harry L. Rockwood, Cleveland's health commissioner, will be "taller, sinner and healthier."

Venus de Milo and Old Man Adonis, says he, are "too fat."

Three reasons for the development of a new race, as Dr. Rockwood sees it: Fashion, diet and exercise. Growing popularity of sports," he declares, "is having its effect on the body figure."
