Huge Presses Shape Buick Parts

A GREAT variety of important parts are stamped from sheet metal in the huge presses such as the one shown above.

In order to eliminate extra operations which would add to the cost of the finished car, many complicated dies must be developed to produce a certain part in as few operations as possible. Fenders, body panels, radiator shells, hoods and cowls must be perfect if they are to look right on the car. A slight imperfection in the stamping would be magnified many times and made glaring after painting and assembling.

Therefore, only the finest steel and the most efficient machinery is used.

Every workman is on the lookout for flaws in his work, and rigid inspection is the rule throughout the plant.

Buick radiator shells are stamped in one piece on a press similar to the one shown. The shell is polished, copper plated, and again polished. The copper plate prevents rust. It is then given a heavy coat of nickel plate and given a final polish, after which it is assembled with a previously tested radiator core.

The press in the illustration stamps the Buick cowl in one operation by means of an expanding die. The die prevents wrinkles and imperfections by stretching the cold steel as it shapes the part.
