Change in the size of Oregon dairy herds is having some effect on the trend of the industry, the experiment station finds. In the coast districts herds where machinery is available, are increased to the maximum carrying size for the farm. In the Willamette valley herds on strictly dairy farms are also being enlarged, but herds carried as sidelines on general farms or truck farms are no more than holding their own in size.

Costs of handling early lambs on eastern Oregon ranges is practically the same as those for handling late lambs, though nearly double the amount of hay is required, an experiment station report says. Some investment for sheds for lambing time is needed, but these extra costs are compensated by slightly larger lamb crop, heavier lambs and usually a better price.
