

FARM REMINDERS

When Oregon red clover growers pay more attention to the seed that is planted and to growing the crop in rotation, according to the state experiment station, there will be less loss from buckhorn, wild carrot and other pests. Buckhorn is particularly objectionable since it is frequently a noxious weed in some of the states, and because it is so expensive to screen out.

Crops like potatoes and corn are easily and cheaply cultivated in Oregon before the crop is planted, reports the experiment station. Weeds are killed before planting with large implements as the disk and harrow. Early plowing followed by disking and harrowing at frequent intervals kills the weeds. Shallow cultivation is best later in the season because it does not bring up more weed seeds.

It will soon be time for Oregon farmers to think of the Canada thistles and the morning glory, reports the experiment station. Patches containing this pest are marked out for separate plowing to avoid dragging the rots to new places. Thorough clean culture is the best method for control that has been found to date.

Corn utilizes manure applied in the spring better than most crops, according to the Oregon experiment station. Spring applications of manure give better results on corn ground than on wheat, oat or barley crops.

Late planting of spring grain is not a good Oregon practice. Grain planted after the first of May gives small yields according to results at the experiment station. It is important that wheat, oats, and barley be planted as soon as the seed bed can be prepared in the spring.

Early planting is necessary for field peas in Oregon. This crop needs cool, moist conditions to insure good growth the experiment station has found. Late plant peas are susceptible to aphid injury. Late sown grain for hay is better without peas.

The most promising place to rid Angora fleeces of the kemp nuisance is the breeding pens, according to A. C. Gage, who gave his illustrated lecture on "From Field to Fabric" before the O. A. C. Agricultural club at the state college. By selecting and mating animals of proper breeding types having a minimum of the objectionable bristle hairs the percentage of kemp in the fleeces can be materially reduced. Removal of the kemp from the rest of the fleece is one of the most difficult and expensive factors of mohair manufacture.

Oregon growers may enlarge their market for more alsike clover for seed, reports the experiment station. It is the surest of the seed crops, and the acreage in western Oregon can well be expanded. There is no surplus of alsike at this time. The important things are clean seed, free from sorrel and white clover, and clean land, free from these and similar pests.
