INFANTILE PARALYSIS IN STATE OF OREGON

Seventy-two cases of epidemic infantile paralysis have been reported to the Oregon State Board of Health. There is no desire to cause unnecessary alarm, but the fact remains that there is an unusual large number of cases of infantile paralysis in this state. Reports from other states indicate an increase in the number of cases of infantile paralysis reported as well as in Oregon. Every available precaution against its spread should be taken. Children should not be permitted to come in contact with sick persons whether it be adults or children who are ill.

The essential point in treatment during the acute stage of infantile paralysis is to keep the patient quiet and avoid handling as much as possible. Spinal punctures may be used to relieve pressure. Occasionally splinting may be necessary to prevent deformity. Serum from convalescent cases has been found of value. There appears to be much difference of opinion as to the value of stock serum now on the market. Such serum is made by the use of streptococcus which is not yet accepted as the cause of infantile paralysis.

After the acute stage is over, the treatment consists in re-educating the muscles, correcting any deformity that may have occurred, and preventing further deformity. This line of treatment, of course, should be in charge of a qualified physician. In the best hands it often requires a period of years to obtain the greatest degree of improvement in the after-care of infantile paralysis cases.

The cause of infantile paralysis is (Continued on Page 8)

Badly Burned
