

Lo, the Poor Hunter

September wanes. There's an exhilarating nip in the early morning. The noon are sun warmed and shrill with the monotonous cadence of the cicada and katydid. The hops have been garnered; and the orchards on the hill top are ready for the harvester.

The woodpile looms high, and the ax has been sharpened. A book of adventure lies beside the old pipe on the reading table. The new instant-lighting gas lamp from Cogswell's has met the one-match test, filling the living room with cheer. There is a chill in the night; the home trail is traced by a stream of light through a rain-splashed window. The easy chair is drawn close to the fire as the patter on the roof quickens to a gust and the wind-whipped fir bough taps the window. The blaze creeping along the log, the blue smoke rising lazily, the comfort that surrounds us, have their softening effect. We draw a deep breath to sigh contentedly—when

The hoot of an owl down in the woods is swept in to us on a gale, and we are transported to another fire-light scene—a campfire, in the depths of the Oregon forest, on the trail of a doe and a buck, a buck with wide-spread antlers. We smile at the recollection of campfire stories; sigh a little as the campfire dies down. The bantering tones of the boys are soon hushed, and peaceful rhythm emanates from the different fir bough beds. We seek our own restful couch, and sleepily watch the tree tops waving in the wind that has risen; see again the moon—a hunter's moon—rollicking about among black-tipped billowy clouds that flee in panic before the wind.

A voice—not the bantering tone of one of the boys—recalls us. We fight irritably in the chair that is no longer easy; and the breath that was drawn in to be emitted as a sigh of content forms instead the hunter's lament:

The angler shall inherit the earth and all the waters thereon; and should he inadvertently start a forest fire, vast armies shall fare forth to extinguish it;

Whereas, the hunter, imprisoned within four walls, shall inherit an easy chair before his own fireplace and a well-thumbed volume of Baron Munchausen's tales—while in the nearby forest the buck with wide-spread antlers shall derisively rub a velvety nose with a nimble fore-foot!

Shades of Lewis and Clark! Wotta life!

—THE CIRCUITOR.

Since the above lament rang loud and long through the state, the "poor hunter" has come into his own; and he is now, in all probability, administering proper punishment to the over-bold buck that possessed such an eloquent fore-foot.

—THE CIRCUITOR.
