MORE EXPENSIVE PLANTS OFTEN PROVE CHEAPER

Many vegetable growers who depend upon purchasing plants of early vegetables instead of growing them, have the option of buying inferior plants at a cheaper price or superior plants at a somewhat higher figure. For example, cabbage plants grown crowded together and retailed at a few cents a dozen, may be a decidedly inferior buy at this price compared with others retailed at twice that amount but grown at a wider distance apart, making them considerably more vigorous and stocky.

From the standpoint of early cabbage production it will usually pay the grower to buy the more vigorous and slightly more expensive plant. This is true also of lettuce, tomatoes, cauliflower, peppers and egg plant, says the Oregon experiment station.

"SPIKE DISEASE" OF HOPS THREATENS OREGON CROP

European downy mildew of hops, or "spike disease," has been found in the Pacific northwest. This is a dangerous disease of hops and will cause serious loss to hop growers of Oregon if it gets a start here, says the experiment station.

Diseased plants may be recognized by the spike-like appearance of the young shoots, caused from shortening of the joints and the failure of leaves to develop normally. Pale green or greyish-green color, with a somewhat silvery "sheen" on the upper surface, is one characteristic of the disease. Reddish brown angular spots are usually found along the midribs and are caused by a fungus growth which sometimes may be seen growing on the lower side of the leaf.

Anyone finding suspicious plants are asked to send them to the experiment station at Corvallis for identification.

FARM REMINDERS

Before transplanting to the field in Oregon, plants of early vegetables that have been grown under artificial heat are best hardened for 10 or 14 days to prevent any undue check in growth. Such plants as cabbage and lettuce, therefore, are hardened in cold frames by giving them various increasing amounts of air and also lessening the water supply. Then if these plants become slightly frosted they will be better able to withstand the lower temperatures, says the experiment station.

The business-like farmer plans his crops and manages his livestock with careful thought as to what prices will be at market time rather than what they are now, says the Oregon experiment station.

Oregon gardeners growing cauliflower do best by producing this crop for fall use rather than late spring and early summer. While it can be grown during the latter season, cauliflower does best in the cool, moist condition of the fall season. The plants are much more subject to check in growth than cabbage, so often a small head is formed before the plant has started to take much leaf growth, says the experiment station.

Rats and like pests are particularly undesirable around the farm during hatching and breeding season. They are fond of baby chicks and, once given a taste, will be a constant menace.

Using the straw for live stock and the litter for fertilizer will boost the farm receipts through better returns from crops as well as from livestock.

Mrs. Herbert Hoover has been presented with a homespun bedspread, a blanket and several homespun rugs by four "Evangeline girls" of Louisiana, in recognition of Mr. Hoover's aid when their valley was flooded in 1927.
