SAUNDERS QUILTS OFFICE; WEAVER GETS PLACE

J. W. (Andy) Saunders constable in the Estacada district, resigned a few days ago and Charles Weaver was appointed to fill the vacancy. Party nominations will be made in the May primary and the office filled in the November election.

Saunders declares that the office was a financial loss to him and kept him broke buying red ink to balance the budget. His pay was in fees, when he could get them. His bill for gas and oil for his Packard far exceeded the cash received for his services.

CHAPTER ONE

The Pookah was as handsome a stallion as one could hope to see. A long, finely formed head, high erect ears, trim, streamlined legs and a coat of the deepest russet-brown were his outstanding physical qualifications. But perhaps his most important asset were those of temperament. He loved to race, and he never gave up.

Six absorbed and admiring eyes were fastened on the horse as he cantered easily around the track. Two of them belonged to Sir Peter Calvert, stalwart gray-haired British sportsman. Another pair came from a point two feet lower to the right where Sir Peter's grandson Roger was clutching the wooden rail. Two other eyes were peering from behind the furrowed brows of Wilkins, who had trained The Pookah from the time he was an awkward colt.

"Hi, Joey" beckoned Wilkins motioning to the stable boy who was giving the Pookah his workout. "Come 'ere a minute."

The boy complied.

"Take 'im the other way round the course," ordered Wilkins. "We've got to teach him the American way." Joey stared in consternation.

"Go on, go on," added the trainer. "You know and I know it's the wrong way to run but since America's the place 'e's goin' to run, that's the way 'e'll have to learn."

Off went the Pookah this time in what, from the standpoint of English racing conditions a backwards direction. Roger climbed on the rail gleefully.

"The Pookah doesn't seem to mind which way he runs," exclaimed Roger. "Does he grandfather?"

Sir Peter made no reply.

"I could teach that horse to run backwards on two legs," cut in Wilkins. "And 'e'd still be out in front. Drawin' a load of 'ay too."

Roger jumped down and run off to follow the progress of the horse around the track. His throats were all on the challenge which Sir Peter had accepted to send another highly fancied racer across the Atlantic to try for the American cup. Consistently defeated in previous attempts to bring back this coveted trophy to Briton Sir Peter had felt that he must make at least one more attempt. The Pookah was his favorite racer out of a quarter of a century of blue ribbon competition. Somehow Roger felt that the horse sensed the trust imposed upon him and wouldn't let the family down.

Wilkins who had been studying the taciturn Sir Peter between closely knit brows moved closer.

"If you'll excuse me sir," he said, "you don't seem none too happy about the horse. There's nothing the matter is there sir."

"Nothing that anybody could blame you for Wilkins," answered his master soberly.

"I've always done the best I could" replied Wilkins. "I wouldn't like to feel I was—well a failure."

However hard he tries a man can fail," said Sir Peter, eyes averted.

"I know what you're thinking of sir," responded Wilkins. "Those other horses we took to America. Well we 'ave failed before I grant, you, but we won't this time. Not with The Pookah. We'll show these Yankees this time."

Sir Peter hesitated a moment before replying then turned and looked awkwardly at his devoted retainer.

"We're not going to America this year," he said slowly.

"Not going sir," stammered Wilkins.

"No," said Sir Peter, "I'm afraid that decision is final."

Wilkins understood how to control his emotions. He was an expert at self restraint. As he moved away how ever Roger ran up.

The boy knew immediately from the expressions of the two men that something was a miss. He made a shrewd guess and, as it happened, an accurate one at the cause of the disturbance.

"Grandfather," he said taking Sir Peter's arm, "it's money you're worried about isn't it?"

"Whatever it is there's nothing to bother you," said Sir Peter.

"Yes there is. It worries you it ought to worry me. And it does. And if you're thinking of not taking The Pookah, but you can't be."

Sir Peter's silence was the most forceful of all answers.

"Oh, but you must take him to America," cried Roger. "Grandfather listen. I shall have some money shan't I, when I come of age?"

"Yes, you will have," answered Sir Peter.

"Then let me take some of that "I thought you wouldn't consider the offer," said the other.

"Threadneedle," cried Sir Peter, suddenly rising. "Have you the papers with you?"

"Why yes," said the other startled, "but surely you're not—"

"I shall sign them and post them to you tonight," said Sir Peter. "I'm to go to America."

Pollock, the butler took almost as much pride in the accomplishments of a Calvertson racing entry as Sir Peter himself. He was engaged in pouring out some soda when Sir Peter made his declaration and he almost dropped the siphon bottle. It was not quite time for Master Roger to receive his mid-morning glass of milk, but for once Pollock was going to make an exception to his rigidly followed schedule.

Controlling his excitement he hurried with the refreshment tray to the room where the boy's tutor was discussing algebraic roots.

"You're early Pollock," said Roger while the instructor tapped on his desk impatiently.

"Beg your pardon," answered the butler, "but I thought you'd like to hear the news. The master's just decided to go to America."

Roger stared a first incredulous, then in wild jubilation.

"Whoopee," he cried leaping up and flinging a whole sheaf of lesson papers over his head. "must tell Wilkins. Whoopee."
