Decrease Shown in Fatalities

Reversing a nine-year upward trend Oregon bicycle fatalities showed a decrease of nearly one-half as compared to 1939 with eight fatalities listed in 1940 against 15 for the year before, a drop of 46.6 percent it was revealed by Earl Snell, secretary of state.

The year 1940 was the first time since 1931 that bicycle fatalities have dropped and it was the lowest number of victims since 1937 when six persons were killed in bicycle traffic accidents.

The average age of the bicycle accident victims during 1940 was 14½ years, Snell's figures disclosed the oldest bicycle fatality involved was a person 22 years of age and the youngest was eleven.

Six of the eight persons killed or 75 percent met death on rural highways the accidents resulting in most cases when the bicycle riders rode onto the highway from a side road or a private driveway and cut across the path of a coming motor vehicle.

"The substantial decrease in bicycle fatalities in 1940 is significant of the success of the recent movement for bicycle regulation in this state," Snell declared. "During the past two years many Oregon cities and communities have set up bicycle control programs based on local ordinances designed to eliminate dangerous riding practices and to emphasize the importance of obedience to regulations. In addition to improving bicycle riding practices, this safety program unquestionably implants in the minds of the younger generation the importance of applying these principles of safe operation to the driving of automobiles as they become older."

More than 20 Oregon cities and towns now have official bicycle regulatory programs. Most of the ordinances adopted during the past two years prohibit such unsafe practices as riding double, which resulted in two of the eight deaths in 1940, riding two or more abreast, cutting across traffic, turning in the middle of the block and riding on the left side of the street. They require proper lighting equipment and provide that bicycle riders must give proper hand and arm signals when making turns. Obedience to traffic control signals is stressed in all these programs.

In some Oregon cities riders who violate provisions of the bicycle ordinance are haled before a special bicycle court sometimes presided over by youthful judges with juries of boys and girls to hear evidence in the cases. Punishment in many instances includes impoundment of the offender's bicycle for a period of a week or more.

Inquiries regarding practical programs for bicycle regulations received at the office of the traffic safety division of the state department indicate still further expansion of this program during the present year it was said.

Arrangements for filing of birth certificate principally by persons born in Oregon between the dates of 1890 and 1910 are rapidly increasing according to county clerk Guy H. Pace. Birth records were not authorized in Oregon until 1910 and from that date 1910 were not kept with any degree of accuracy he said.

Opportunity for employment in civil service, national defense job and other types of employment in which is necessary for the applicant to furnish a birth certificate has resulted in a great demand for such records.

A recent Oregon law permits the recording of birth data where an affidavit is obtainable from either parent, a near relative or some person having direct knowledge of the birth the date providing the affidavit be supported by some person outside the family who also has knowledge of the exact or approximate date of birth. This opportunity for recording a birth however is open only to persons born within the state of Oregon.

Since August of 1930 county clerk Pace stated Monday his office has had 240 birth certificates, has approximately 100 pending and has furnished application blanks to many persons who are attempting to secure affidavits.
