Rich Wood Cargo Missing From Sunken Freighter

The treasure ship of Lake Erie, the rugged and once glorious three-masted schooner New Brunswick, is free to settle for eternity in her sandy grave five miles out from Wheatley, Ont.

For the New Brunswick, after 80 years, has satisfied the curiosity of treasure seekers who have dreamed of salvaging the cargo that went down with her in a pounding storm in 1859. Divers entered the hull of the ship recently and found only the broken ribs and empty hull of a proud ship that once sailed under three masts, the Detroit News reports.

The searchers closed forever the legend of the vast store of wealth in white oak and walnut that went down with the New Brunswick under the red flares of distress.

The New Brunswick was a schooner in the days when lumber was king in Michigan and Ontario. Her skipper was Red McTavish and her first mate was Buff Warren. Together they rode her through the Great Lakes and over the Atlantic to Liverpool. They carried a cargo of 18,000 bushels of wheat from Chicago and the New Brunswick was the first in history to cross the lakes and ocean.
