GAS MASK USEFUL BUT NOT BEAUTIFUL

No gas mask it is needless to state was ever made purely for reasons of allure.

At the same time the designers of the present civilian type gas mask approved by the United States government have not gone out of their way as some mask makers seem to have done to prepare a really horrendous disguise for persons seeking refuge from gas attack.

The U. S. mask in fact while not calculated to add to the charms of a Dottie Lamour or an Ann Sheridan still has about as much style as anyone would feel inclined to want while avoiding a gas attack.

More important than gas mask pulchritude however, is gas mask efficiency and here the U. S. mask stacks up with the best as actual tests recently made by the U. S. navy at Puget Sound navy yard prove. The masks are stout and well made and, more vital, they perform their function of filtering and neutralizing poisonous gasses efficiently and completely.

Technically, the masks combine two air-purifying elements. One is a filter which removes exceedingly small particles of liquid or solid from the air much as fish are caught in the meshes of a gill net.

The other element is a combination of chemical materials which absorb and then, in most cases, neutralize chemically the gas molecules which floats in the air.

These materials are charcoal which has been activated by air, carbon dioxide or steam and soda lime.

The charcoal when so activated has the peculiar property of absorbing grasping and holding its own weight of poison gas molecules which come in contact with it.

Then the soda lime reacts to neutralize acid gases and thus supplements and reinforces the action of the charcoal within the mask.

It is true that a gas mask of this type in time if used repeatedly will finally become useless by exhaustion of the charcoal and lime ingredients and the choking up of the filter.

Then it is time to get replacements but you can be sure that any mask will last longer than the longest conceivable gas raid.
