

Lack of Snow Hinders Skiing

"Hedge-hopping" was the order of the day at Timberline Sunday as more than 1500 avid skiers dodged rocks and determined not to let the lack of snow spoil their slat-riding pleasures.

While officials of next Sunday's Arnold Lunn downhill race cast anxious eyes at the skies in the hopes that Old Ullr would deposit at least one more foot of snow before race time, warm temperatures sent Timberline's snow depth down to the 16-inch level exposing hundreds and hundreds of rocks and ridges on the skiing areas.

Despite the awkwardness of the situation skiing went ahead at full speed and slatsters confined their activities largely to well-packed slopes where skiing was pronounced good. Race officials said Sunday that unless one foot more snow fell by Wednesday the race would be postponed one week. Olaf Rodegaard, Timberline Lodge ski school instructor declared that at least one foot more of snow was necessary before the course could be declared safe. Rodegaard will lay the course.

Forest service officers said nearly 400 cars were counted in the Timberline Lodge parking areas Sunday, 47 of which carried out of state license plates. Skies were overcast the entire day and a northwest wind, one that usually brings in snow swept across the south side.

Skiing injuries numbering 17 were cared for by the Mt. Hood ski patrol most of the accidents running to punctures from collisions with rocks. Trail running and skiing below the lodge was virtually nil.
