BETTER SCHOOLS -- AND YOU

by HENRY TOY, Jr., President
National Citizens Council for Better Schools

THE HOMETOWN GROUPS

A very snappy saying in the Twenties was "Let George do it!" But George went out with bootleg rum and the password, "Joe sent me!"
In the Twenties, we were perfectly content to let George deal with all the school problems that came up. Everything seemed to be going along pretty well so why should anyone else bother?
Fortunately, that was a long time ago. We've seen a whole new rebirth in citizen interest in this country. We're moving into the tenth year of full-fledged dedication on the part of the public to work out their school problems at the local level.

Who are some of these people across the country?
From what I've seen of them in their communities and through the letters they write, they are very much a cross-section of America. Most of them are parents, of course, working to see that their children get the best possible education. And they're both the parents, too, not just the mothers. A typical committee for school improvement in a town of 15,000 might very well include a half-dozen housewives, a dentist, a lawyer, a clergyman, a grocer, a retail merchant, a factory worker, a business executive, and a couple of farmers.

If that committee follows the national pattern, all religious affiliations will be represented on the committee and so will the various economic and social groupings of the town.

These committees usually begin by gathering the facts about their local schools. I'm constantly astounded at the amount of time and effort the members are willing to give in order to become well informed about education. They're eager to know what others have done in other parts of the country, in hopes that some adaptation might work in their hometown.

Working in cooperation with the school board, these committees are changing the face of the land as far as education goes. Without them, there would be a tremendous vacuum in our current struggle for first-rate education.
If you'd like to know more about starting a citizens' committee in your community, write for our free booklet, "How Can We Organize for Better Schools?" Write Dept. D, Better Schools, 9 East 40th Street, New York City.
