By JAMES W. DOUTHAT

WASHINGTON, D. C. August 13—A determined campaign to protect the nation's fiscal solvency and prevent additional inflation from further cheapening the value of the dollar—was urged in the House as Congress grappled with multi-billion dollar spending proposals preparatory to adjournment.

The fiscal program proposed was simple—but its effectiveness depends upon the degree of support received from leaders in industry and public affairs.

It simply calls for the American people to "wake up and start demanding that Congress stop its spending spree."

Such action would have far-reaching effects for it is through grandiose programs financed by ever higher government spending that the New Fair Dealers carry on their campaign which has had the effect of sending the nation a considerable distance down the road toward socialism.

This prescription for stimulating economy in government—and thereby relieving many of the nation's ills—came from Rep. Byrnes (R. Wis.) amid a volley of criticism from many of his colleagues of mounting federal spending.

Rep. Byrnes electrified his economy-minded colleagues by refusing to run up the white flag of surrender to advocates of astronomical expenditures. He gave this as his basic conviction: "I think there is always the hope that when people start to understand—and the people must be made to understand where we are—there will be a change in attitude. There must be a change."

"And I am sure Congress will be responsive to a feeling for economy on the part of the people. I have not given up the fight and I am still going to exert every effort I can to bring economy into our government."

What gave real significance to this rallying cry for resistance to further profligate spending was the setting.

$288 Billion Debt Ceiling

It came as shocked members of the House were considering (and approving) the Administration's request to boost the federal debt ceiling to the record peacetime level of $288 billion.

It came while the House was being warned by some of its most influential members that if Congress continued to appropriate huge sums unnecessarily there was no doubt that the debt ceiling would be elevated still higher and there would be further cause for fiscal alarm.

It came while Secretary of the Treasury Anderson was saying that "the debt ceiling—although raised as requested this year—definitely would have to be re-examined next year to determine whether another raise would be recommended."

It came while Budget Director Stans was saying that the deficit for this fiscal year might soar beyond the $12 billion now forecast (unless spending proclivities were restrained) and there was a strong possibility that government spending would average $80 billion for each of the next 5 years, including the current one ending next June 30.

(Spending this year is estimated at the present time at $79 billion. Receipts are expected to be $67 billion, leaving $12 billion deficit.)

All of these developments combined served to emphasize the need for eliminating all unnecessary spending.

It was pointed out clearly and convincingly that the spending programs pushed by the New-Fair Dealers must be financed by inflation-creating deficit spending—and paid for by tax burdens passed on to succeeding generations.

Launching Sputnik I by Russia, it was recalled, was utilized by the New-Fair Dealers as the basis for renewed—and enlarged—spending demands both for defense and non-defense purposes.

These demands continued throughout this session of Congress—and frequently the Administration was severely condemned for not spending more than it proposed.

As a result to give just two examples, Congress voted double the amount of money the Administration requested for Atomic Energy Commission construction and added $815,857,000 to the Defense Department appropriation bill over the protest of the Administration.

Administration officials, however, take the position that they are not required to spend every penny appropriated by Congress. Here is how Budget Director Stans explained it to the House Ways and Means Committee:

"It is my understanding, as a legal matter, that appropriations are limitations on expenditures and not mandates to spend. The Administration could, if it determined that an expenditure was unnecessary or undesirable, withhold the spending."

OREGON COW TOTAL HITS NEW LOW

The number of milk cows on Oregon farms has dropped to the lowest point in record and milk production continues a downward trend, reports Oregon State college extension service.

Oregon has 173,000 milk cows this summer, a drop of 2-1/2 percent from last year and the smallest number in 25 years of record, according to Stephen C. Marks, OSC agricultural economist. The report is based on a mid-summer inventory by the state crop reporting service.

Milk production in Oregon last month dropped 2 million pounds below the same month a year ago, Marks said.

Hot weather throughout most of Oregon during the past month has also lowered milk production, says Don E. Anderson, OSC dairy specialist.

When temperatures are 80 degrees or higher, farmers are advised to provide animals with shade and make sure fresh drinking water is near.
