Notes by the Wayside

(By John J. Inskeep, County Agent)

Last week we discussed the Molybdenum problem in Oregon. To throw further light on this problem we are submitting a number of questions and answers.

1.Q: Where does molybdenum occur in nature?
 A: Very widely distributed in the earth's crust, in soils and in plant and animal tissues.

2.Q: How much molybdenum do soils contain?
 A: Most soils in the United States contain only 2 to 7 lbs. (1 to 3.5 ppm) of total molybdenum per acre in the surface 7 inches. Most soils are not deficient but release enough molybdenum to meet plant needs. Extremely small amounts are required by plants. For example, 3,000 tons of alfalfa hay, grown with adequate but not excessive molybdenum, would contain from 3 to 6 pounds of molybdenum.

3.Q: Why are the scientists so concerned about the few ounces of soil molybdenum available to plants?
 A: The level of available molybdenum determines whether plants may obtain enough for best growth, or whether they may absorb enough to become detrimental to man and his animals.

4.Q: Where is research work with molybdenum as it affects plant growth being conducted in the Pacific Northwest?
 A: The Washington Agricultural Experiment Station started field research about 6 years ago. In Oregon, greenhouse experiments were started about 5 years ago and field experiments in 1956. The Idaho Agricultural Experiment Station also has done some work on the problem.

5.Q: Is there evidence that application of molybdenum will increase yields of crops in Oregon?
 A: Yes, research data from field experiments have shown that this is possible where legumes are grown on certain acid soils. Research now underway and planned will provide more specific answers. Due to the comparatively low cost per acre, even small increases in yield will be profitable, provided the molybdenum content of forage is not increased extensively.

6.Q: Where in Oregon have applications of molybdenum increased crop yields?
 A: Increased legume yields have been obtained only on some acid mineral soils where response from application of lime has been demonstrated or expected. Marked response has not been observed when these soils were limed. Some acid soils, such as peats, mucks and coastal soils appear to have adequate available molybdenum for plants.
