Idly, through the open window, he studied the boy. He was a very stupid-looking boy, and at this time of his superior's disability a very important boy.

The tramp operator waited at last of the boy's "smartness" on the line, and leaned back against the side of the station listening to the clamor of the dispatcher circuit—listening to orders, reports and other minutiae of running trains by telegraph.

ute of her time, and being but now forty-five minutes late, desired to proceed on eastward to Hogarth for the meeting, rather than risk having to wait at Williamson.

It is very likely that the dispatcher had an attack of vertigo at that moment when he realized that a fast freight train and a heavy passenger train were approaching one another on a curving, twisting track, each going at highest speed and each seeking to make a different station for passing.

Very likely the boy would have told the ragged and dirty tramp to mind his own business but for that allusion to the dispatcher. Heaven permitted the fool to have a thought at the right time, and in an expostulating, mumbling way he said: "No, he ain't."

There was no time for him to complete his simile, for Kenneth was through the window now and had the red office flag in his hand.
