Somehow it seems as though athletes of national reputation have an affinity for this place, or more correctly this place has an affinity for them. Three men who hold world's records, who have met the best in their line and come off victors, drift back to Forest Grove as soon as possible after the taking of the plum. There is Forrest C. Smithson, the phenomenal hurdler who did wonderful work on the Multnomah field Saturday and would have beaten the world's record in the 100 yard hurdles had it not been for the sudden turn in the track. He holds a bunch of national and world's records in the hurdles, but what is more to the point, Forest Grove looks good to Forrest Smithson and by the way, maybe Forrest was named after this city. He has changed the spelling a little, but then Dame Rumor has it that he is real fond of changing names.

In little "Gillie," Forest Grove has another admirer. And for the benefit of those who do not know who little Gillie is let the writer give you the tip that it is Alfred C. Gilbert who again won the World's championship in the pole vault Saturday at New York City, by clearing the bar at the marvelous height of twelve feet, seven and three quarter inches. While attending Pacific University little Gillie developed an ineffable fondness for this city, and after school is over at Yale each year he always makes a bee line for this place.

Yes and there is Archie Hahn. Archie is engaged—that is he has been employed by Pacific to coach the track and football teams for next year. He broke the world's record in the 50 meter race at Athens a couple of years ago, and also holds several world's records in indoor events. Archie likes Forest Grove and her population just as much as Gillie and Smithie, and he can hardly wait for a meet held away from home to be over before he boards the first train for Forest Grove. If Shakespeare was alive he would probably not write "What's in a Name." There must be something in the name of this city that makes it attractive for athletes. Let's see. No, it's not in the name either. We've got some fine looking girls here—that's it.

W. T. Buxton and family, formerly of this city but now of Walla Walla, Wash., are building a beautiful new home in the old Fort city and getting along fine. Walla Walla is one of the most beautiful home towns on the coast.
