This editor is not known to be over careful about attending church, but he will be found in the Methodist church next Sunday morning to hear Dr. Homan preach his great sermon on education. He would advise the readers of his paper to conduct themselves in the same proper manner. If he was a student in the high school or the college he would not miss this chance to hear something from this great preacher on this subject.

Whose Advertising Bills are YOU Paying?

When you buy something at a store that does not advertise, you help pay for the publicity of the store that DOES advertise!

The proposition is a perfectly logical one.

Advertising enables a merchant to sell more goods in a day. Thus his daily operating expenses is collected from a large number of customers--instead of from a few.

Assuming that he sells ten times as much merchandise as the non-advertising store sells, he is enabled to greatly undersell his slower competitor, and still make a larger aggregate profit.

The penalty--the tax--therefore, is paid by the hapless shopper who goes to the non-advertising store; and who, by paying a higher price, indirectly "pays for the advertising" that the live merchant does.

Assuredly the patron of the advertising merchant does not "pay for his advertising," for, because of the advertising, such patron saves money on her purchase!
