Two More Interesting Discussions, One Favoring and One Opposed

The Bible in the Public Schools

Education, as it is generally conceived, has as its purpose the making of future citizens. It is the most widespread of all human interests, for it concerns every community and every individual in that community. The state is pouring out untold millions to make it effective, for education is the most stupendous social force in action. In it we see the solution of all the ominous problems which arise threateningly above our national horizon—politics, the corruption and inefficiency of government, immigration, the black man, socialism, divorce, intemperance.

The decadence of our high standards of national life has come about by the corruption of our moral life, and not until we instill into the minds of our people a new conception of character in national affairs can we hope for a brighter outlook or a permanent solution of the great issues now facing us. The great and true end of education is character—character to stand the awful strain of our modern era with its complex social life. Character lies at the base of all human life and upon it depends the solution of our commercial, industrial, political, and social problems. "Our modern education needs the introduction of a new force, a new stimulus, a new energy at the moral centers of man's nature." (Rev. J. H. Boyd.) The trusts, labor union, and other great institutions need, not dissolution, but conscience in the administration of their affairs and at the center of their operations.

As the first great proposition then I would give this: The Bible touches and moulds character as nothing else does. There is no character seed in (Continued on Page Three)
