How Big Shall the Silo Be?

The size of the silo should be such that at least an inch layer is used every day. If less is used, molding and spoiling may result. The warmer the weather the greater the depth of silage that should be removed. In the winter 500 pounds should be removed daily from a 14-foot silo which would make 40 pounds for 12 dairy cows, or 30 pounds for 17 beef cattle. In summer half as much more should be removed. It will require 18 cows fed 40 pounds a day to consume this amount. Silage is a valuable summer feed. Many are using it for this purpose and especially to help out when the pasture is short. Some build a summer silo and make it smaller in diameter than the winter silo, so that a deeper layer can be removed daily. If more capacity is desired it is obtained by increasing the height. In winter at least 350 pounds should be removed from the 12-foot silo and 700 pounds from a 16-foot silo. In summer the amount removed daily from the 12-foot silo should be at least 500 pounds and from the 16-foot silo, 1000 pounds.—Missouri Valley Farmer.
