

A POKE FELLOW.
"Hello."
"That you, George? Where did you drop from?"
"Oh, from home."
"When?"
"Only a week ago."
"The young men met early in the evening on the street of a crowded city."
"I was going to look you up," said George. "But, perhaps," he added, with a glance at two or three other young men who seemed in company with his friend, "your time is taken up tonight."
"Oh, not specially," said Robert Spencer. "My friend, George Marshall," he continued, mentioning the names of his companions to him. "We're just out to take in a little of the city fun. Here's a good place to go to. Have you been here? Come with us."
"As he spoke he pointed up to the brightly-lighted building before which they were standing.
"No, I haven't," said George. "I haven't been about much. If it's a good place, I'd like to go with you."
"It's a theater."
George shook his head, but smiled pleasantly.
"In the country you know, Rob, we are told it will be better for us to keep away from the theater."
"Oh, yes," said Robert, "but there are a great many things said in the country that don't hold in the city. When you once get here in the whirl they look different. Will you go with us?"
"I think not," said George. "At least, not now. When I get into the whirl I may change my mind."
Well, good-bye, then. I'll come and see you soon."
"It isn't at all likely he'll change his mind," said Robert to his companions, looking after George with a little contempt. "He isn't that sort."
Do you know him well?"
"Oh, not so very. He's one of your over-good chaps. A poke fellow. Never goes in for fun, but lays out a line for himself and walks it."
It was some little time afterwards when Robert sought his country friend in his room.
"I thought perhaps you would be out," remarked the former, as he found George occupied with a book.
"I don't go out very much yet. I like to feel my way, and find my place I want to go to. And my time is too well filled up to allow of my taking in many places. It's delightful living in a large place, isn't it?"
"Well, I don't know," said Robert, as he gazed at George's well-satisfied countenance. "Sometimes I think it's a lousy place to be in, and then again I don't. If we hold by all the old notions, the city's a pretty bad place."
"You think so? Why?" George's face lit up. "I think it's fine. Have you been into the great library two or three blocks down the street?"
"No, I haven't. I'm not much of a reader."
"Then," said George, with enthusiasm, "you have something to see yet. The books there are enough fairly to turn a fellow's head. A delightful room to read in, and every one civil and pleasant to you. I tell you it suits me to be in a place where you can get into such a library for nothing—except a recommendation from your employer. And as you don't like reading, have you been up to the Young Men's Christian Association rooms?"
"No."
"There's always something going on there. Not dull preaching either, such as some folks think is the only thing they have in such places. Music and games. No end of fun when you find reading tiresome. And I'm just taking in a course of lectures on geology, and I tell you it takes such things to let you know what an interesting thing it is, this old earth we set our feet on with so little thought of what goes to make it up."
"Well," said Robert, leaning back discontentedly into the chair, "whether you find a place pleasant depends entirely on the sort of thing you go in for."
"Which was as wise an observation as Robert, or any other boy, will be likely to make. It will also be observed that the boys who go to cities will be very apt to find exactly what they look for. Those whose tastes are for things low and vicious, or trifling and wasteful, or instructive and elevating, will be sure to find full gratification for them."
"Yes," went on George, with a smile, "I used to hear a great deal about the badness of a great city. But I must say I have found a good deal that's good."
"But you want to try things all around before you really know about things," said Robert. "Come on and go with me to the theater tonight."
"I haven't got into the whirl yet," said George. "And if I wanted to go over so much I can't afford it."
"Pshaw! I go as often as once a week, and my pay is no better than yours."
"How do you manage it?" said George gravely. "I have only just enough to get along on."
"Well, that's just the way with me," grumbled Robert. "In fact, he went on after a little hesitation, "I have to borrow once in a while."
"And whom do you find to lend to you?" I couldn't borrow if I was hungry," said George with a laugh. "I borrow without asking leave," said Robert.
"You don't mean—?"
"Yes I do. I mean that when I'm in a tight place I borrow a little from the till."

Robert had spoken lightly, but George gazed at him with an expression of the deepest concern and surprise.
"You mean that you took it—without leave? Why, Rob, you and I are old neighbors. Now—you're going to tell me you're getting a joke on me, aren't you?"
"No I ain't, George," said Robert, with an uneasy look.
"How do you expect to return it?"
"I'm looking for a raise in my salary at the end of the year."
"And if it don't come?"
"Well—"
"Do you know," George went on hesitatingly, after a pause, "that there's another name for that?"
"I suppose there is—if I was found out. You needn't look so shocked. I don't mean anything wrong. It's only a little at a time. I've always meant to put it back as I went along, but I couldn't and so it's gone on."
"But the money wasn't yours. It was trusted into your hands, and you—"
"Oh, go on," said Robert, a little angrily. "Call it by the name you're hinting at. Say at once I stole it."
"It won't make the matter any worse for me to say it, and it won't make it any better for me not to say it, more's the pity. But—what's the use of talking, Rob? I do feel awfully about this."
Robert's face showed that his anger had been more assumed than felt, and that he had, to a great extent, shared the concern of his friend.
"Seems to me like walking over a volcano, Rob, this way you're going on. Of course I know you didn't mean any wrong—I mean much wrong, for you may get mad with me if you like, but you can't make me believe you felt just right when you laid your hands on other folk's money—but you're likely to be found out any day, and then what?"
Robert gave a restless movement.
"Then it means a courtroom," continued George, "and when it gets to that they won't call it by any polite names. It won't be borrowing then, and you know it. When you borrow a thing you ask for it. When you don't ask, it's something else."
Robert took a few turns about the room.
"It's all just as you say, George," he said at length. "If I could fix it right at once I'd do it, but I can't. How much do you need?"
"Oh, I can get within fifteen dollars of it."
George sat for a few moments as if calculating within himself.
"Rob," he said, "I can let you have that much for awhile."
Robert grasped his hand.
"You're a real friend in need, George," he said fervently. "I'll promise I'll never get myself in such a trap again."
"You needn't make any promise to me. I'm not the one. And I'm not a preacher, but I'd just like to say that when you settle the matter with some one else and your own conscience, I hope you'll decide to keep out of such doings, not only because of the trouble it might work for you, but because right is right, and wrong is wrong, no matter whether you call things by their real names or not."
The two boys lived some distance apart and, both being fully employed, for some time saw little of each other. Cold weather came on, and Robert, on several occasions, noticed that George did not seem warmly clad.
"Why don't you wear your overcoat?" he several times asked, and George parried the question with a laugh.
"I'm not one of your delicate fellows," he said, when Robert pressed him closer, "I don't need an overcoat."
"You haven't one? Why?"
"Oh, I'll have one after awhile—if I need it."
"George," a sudden flash arose to Robert's face, "it is because I borrowed your money?"
"Go long with your questions," laughed George. "When I need the money I'll let you know."
"A poke fellow!" I called him," Robert said to himself, as he thought it over. "Live and learn. I've heard old folks say. I haven't lived so very long, but I've learned a few things, and learned them well. I hope, Ourselves is to call things by their names, and doings—by their right names. A man of them is that you can't do a mean, underhand, deceitful, wicked deed—yes, that's the word—without others beside your self suffering for it."

THE EXPOSITION FLYER.
We are now fifty minutes out; the throttle is closed. A half mile ahead is the water trough. When the engine reaches it, the fireman drops a spout, and in thirty seconds the big truck trough is dry. When the tank is filled the throttle is opened, the fireman returns to his place at the furnace door; and in a few minutes we are sailing along the line as fast as before. The black smoke curling gracefully above the splendid train reminds me of what Meredith said of his sweetheart:
"Her flowing tresses blown behind Her shoulders in the merry wind." Swinging the door open, the skilled fireman threw in three or four shovels of coal, closed it and leaned out the window, watching the stack. The trained fireman can tell by the color of the smoke how the fire burns. The pointer goes around to 190, and the white steam begins to flutter from the relief valve at the top of the dome. She must be cooled a little now, or she will pop, and waste her energy. An extra flow of cold water quenches her burning thirst, and she quiets down. How like a woman when her heart is hurt! She must be soothed and petted, or she will burst into tears and sob helplessly.
Now we turn into a long tangent, and are clipping off a mile a minute. Our iron steed trembles, shakes and vibrates a little, but aside from the fact that there is some dust, the cab is not an uncomfortable place. The exhausts, that began in the Grand Central station, like the explosion of a shot-gun, come so fast, so close together, that they sound like the drumming of a pheasant's wing.
The sun sinks behind the big blue mountains, the shadows creep across the valley, and up to our window comes the faint perfume of the field roses—the last seed of summer in the soft September winds. Here and there we can see the lamps lighted in the happy homes of the Hudson, while the many-colored signal lamps light up our way.
Not long ago I stood for the first time on the deck of a steamer, bounding over the billowy bar at the mouth of the Columbia river, and was filled with a reckless joy. Looking down at the little woman who hung to the railing near me, I beheld a face radiant with rapture. "How is it?" I asked. "It's worth drowning for," was her answer; and so I reckon now. Taking into consideration all the risk, and the fact that I must remain on this narrow sea for twenty hours yet, I am forced to confess that so grand a trip is but poorly paid for.
If I am at all uneasy it is only when turning the slightly reversed curves, where the way changes from a two to a four track road, or back. Plain curves are all well enough. But it does not seem quite right to shoot her into those kinks at a mile a minute. Yet, after I have seen her take two or three of these, I rather enjoy it. She sways to the right, to the left, then with a smart shake of her head when she finds the tangent, she speeds away like the wind. The engineer looks across the cab and smiles, and the "exposition flyer" rolls into Albany on time.—McClure's Magazine.
