He gazed out on the various scenes

As the train went speeding by. In all the cities we passed through And many smaller places, We saw a large and idle throng With anxious, haggard faces.

They gathered around the platforms
And they shouted through the door, And bring back good times once more

Our factories are all idle now, And closed is our every mill, We hear the engines throb no more, And the wheels are dumb and still.
Within our homes there is a gloom
That dull times have produced,
Our towns are filled with idle men, o poverty now reduced.

"You have my sympathy, my boys, Replied Uncle Sum to all, locked yourselves outside those Shops, by your own votes, a year ago last

But we're bound for the Capitol, There to learn what can be done, And no doubt you'll hear semething drop When we get to Washington."

Arriving at our journey's end We found a mighty multitude There, all drawn up in line. They were calling Grover Cleveland, Soon he faced the howling mob, Of ten thousand angry people, Each howling for a job

I saw men and women in that crowd, With hair long since turned gray Demanding if they now must beg, In our free America.

And I saw countless sewing girls, All with features pinched and wan, Asking why the looms were silent, Of that man in Washington.

I saw a gray haired veteran In a suit of union blue, One siceve hung empty at his side, He spoke—holding that in view "I went forth at my country's call To conquer but never yield, The arm that should fill this sleeve The awful storms of rebel balls,

Laid low many Union braves; To-day they're sleeping in the South In their unmarked, grass grown grav Some thousands died in agony And in unknown graves are laid, Starved and died true Union men, in The Andersonville stockade The noble women of the North,

With tender pitying care, Nursed the wounded rebel prisoner While they breathed a silent prayer That their own loved ones far away Might fall in as gentle hands,
To bathe their wounds, or close their ey
Should they die in southern lands. But those loved lay with undressed

Wounds, exposed to rain and sun, With his ever ready gun. Your haughty belles would scorn to spe To a "hated Yankee-spy," In filth and untold misery They were left alone to die. The dying growns of wounded men,

As for friends they called or prayed, Was music to the rebel guard In that cursed death stockade. But the army guns were laid away And the battle's din did cease, The war clouds rolled away at last And clear was the sky or peace. Prosperity shone o'er our land,

And forgotten were our fears But now in one year you've undone. The grand work of thirty years. We've borne with patience, all we could, And we're now here to demand The rights of free born citizens, We would have you understand

You're a servant of the people And we are not your slaves, You ignore the rights of orphans And you scorn the Union braves, You've tinkered with the tariff law Just as foreigners have planned, You have catered to Great Britain Till their goods now flood our land

Mills and factories are idle Thousands seek for work to-day. And to the shop girl's pleading voice You have turned your ear away, You have robbed the feeble soldier And defied the pension laws. Now we are here to recommend That you be removed for cause

Is my war picture over drawn, Have I said one word unfair""
"Well, I don't know," answered Grover,
"For you see I wasn't there." Then Uncle Sam stepped up and said. "Grover, your term has now expired, Take your duck gun and fishing rod And consider yourself fired.

Then he introduced a stranger, With his Yankee smile, so bland, 'Twas McKinley, of Ohio, With his tariff bill in hand. Ten thousand voices then sent forth A glad cry, loud and shrill With three cheers for Bill McKinley And McKinley's tariff bill.

Ah, what a sudden, mighty change, As the news spread far and near Mill wheels began to move at once, There was nothing more to fear. We bade farewell to Washington, Started on our journey home; We knew by throngs of busy men,
