When hit while standing inactive most men threw up their hands and cried out and staggered while the fight was on. Now and strongly in the direction or all that is the regiment was advancing they fell with curses on their lips, and sometimes rose up again and limped painfully after their comrades. If or changing its position, then men wailed out like children-not so much over the hurt as because they realized that they were to be left on the field to suffer and would be helpless to protect themselves.

When a regiment was in line, waiting to move to the right or the left or be advanced, the thud of a bullet as it struck a man could be heard by the men on his right and left. If struck on the chest or shoulder or head he fell out of the ranks threw up his hands with a shout, and then fell like a log. If struck below the breast he nearly always lurched forward and placed his hands on the wound and sunk down with a groan. The demeanor of no two wounded men were alike in minor particulars, but strangely alike in the first movements. A soldier shot through the head or heart-shot dead in his tracks, as you might term it-was then the younger woman remarked not instantly killed.
