I also visited another sawmill where the principal saw ran horizon- tally and took a slice off the top of the log. The plank had to be con- stantly wedged up to keep from bind- ing on the saw and then it ran so slow an American mill man would have a fit. Close by was a native mill, where Chinamen was sawing out cigar box boards by hand. Thep were cut as true as could be and they had no other guide except the eye. That same day I went over an oil mill, where consmuts were being ground for their oit. A buffalo pulled a stone roller in a circular trough and then the press. The meal is put into small sacks fitting onto a ring and a number of these are placed in the press and several stout Chinamen drove in wedges by means of batter- ing ram.	Case was soon finished.
