"Oh, yes," replied Mr. Melville; "I will trust you. I would trust you with anything, Miss Abigail-with myself even," he added, little knowing how his words were applied.

"The 28th," said Mr. Melville, settling back in his chair and looking at Miss Abtgall.

"Oh, dear," she said. "So soon as that? Well, I will try and be ready." "And Joachim must not know I am going away. It would break his heart. leave in the morning."

"Yes," said Miss Abigail, "I will see to the cat," but she looked surprised. Why should Mr. Melville mention the cat at such a time?

"Oh, not at all," She was afraid that there might be some one in the hall listening, so she rose to terminate the interview, and just then some one cam Mr. Melville was very busy for the next two weeks, and if Miss Abigail herself had not been so busy with making all the arrangements for the wedding she might have thought that he wasn't a very ardent lover.

When Miss Abigail had occasion to ask questions in regard to the ceremony, which was only once or twice, she had to wait until every one was out of the dining room to get a chance to speak to him. He had expressly stated that she was to attend to everything. It was to be a quiet wedding with only Mrs. Jenkins and Mr. Smith-Jones and Potter present, and Mrs. Jenkins was to have a lunch for then afterward.

She bad asked him if 3 o'clock in the afternoon would answer and if it should occur at St. James, Piccadilly. He had repeated the words James, Piccadilly and said yes, wondering why Miss Abi gail referred to his brother's business in Piccadilly. Mr. Smith-Jones was to be best man.

In due course of time the 28th arrived, Miss Abigail's wedding day. After Mr. Melville had departed for the city Joachim and all his belongings were, according to instructions, carried down to Miss Manning's room. Now, it bappened that on reaching the city Mr. Melville found there was not much for him to do the last day, so he returned early to the house, de termined to have a nice rest until it It being a warm day, and he having then red. The bride was frightened. had a bearty lunch, it happened that when Mr. Smith-Jones, dressed and ready for the momentous occasion, no amount of knocking and pounding door, had found the bridegroom elect fast asleep in a chair, with his feet the wedding party.

Mr. Melville seemed dazed and die not know what to do until his mentor stepped up and put Miss Abigail's arm in his. Mr. Smith-Jones went on ahead as a sort of usher, and Mrs. Jenkins, on the arm of Mr. Potter, followed. The church was so dark, coming in from the sunlight, that Mr. Melville could not at first see anything. He thought to himself it must be natural for the best man to take in the bride. At the altar the minister, an old and deaf man, was already waiting. He was in a great hurry to get through, so as to take a train for the country. and began the service before the wed ding party knew what they were about Poor Melville did not notice anything antil Smith-Jones was poking at his elbow and finally put Melville's hand into Miss Abigall's, and Smith-Jones who had the ring, was also obliged to put that on the bride's finger. Then they were all hustled into the vestry to sign the register, where the old clergyman was already out of his surpli
