H. V. Gates, of Hillsboro, who has large interests in the water systems of the Northwest, thinks the Bull Run pipe line should be renewed with reinforced concrete when the time comes, says the Portland Telegram of Wednesday. "We have seen that the iron and steel pipe are comparatively short lived," he said today, "while it is well known that concrete will last for ages. Steel pipe, such as composed the Bull Run main, will only last for about fifteen years, while cast iron may be made to do duty for twenty-five. It is only a question of a short time when the present pipe will need renewal, and at the increased cost of iron and steel the expense is going to be heavier than most people realize. At present rates it would take $1,500,000 to renew the pipe with steel. The cost of reinforced concrete is higher still, but concrete pipe has been known to last for 100 years in Europe. The question is how much pressure concrete will stand. There is no question about its lasting. Steel plate pipe cannot resist corrosion, although its strength is equal to all the strain that the present gravity system of Portland will place upon it. Patching will be necessary hereafter, as pin holes have begun to appear in those portions of the pipe subjected to the greatest strain. The pipe can be made to render service by patching for some little time yet, but the day of entire renewal cannot be far distant."
