Friedman's jumper propped up in a corner of a Marble Room, where he sat smoking his pipe, was a shadow of the man he once was. His eyes were dull, and his voice was weak, as if he were struggling to keep his head above water.

"I've been through so much..." he muttered hoarsely. "I've seen things... I've known things..."

He paused, lost in his own thoughts. The memories of his past were like a weight on his shoulders, a burden he could not bear. He was a different man now, a broken man, a man who had lost everything.

"I want to go home... I want to be..." he continued, his voice barely audible. "I just want to..."

His words trailed off, lost in the silence of the room. He was alone, and he knew it. The weight of his past was too much to bear.

The door opened, and a familiar face appeared. It was his old friend, the one who had always been there for him. But now, he was different. His friend was different, too. They were both changed by the weight of the world.

"Buddy, I need your help..." Friedman said, his voice barely above a whisper. "I need you to help me..."

His friend looked at him, his eyes filled with a mixture of compassion and concern. "I'll do what I can, buddy," he said, his voice firm and reassuring.

Friedman smiled weakly, grateful for his friend's presence. "Thanks..." he said, his voice fading away as he closed his eyes and drifted into a fitful sleep.

The weight of the world was too much for him, too much for any of us. But we must remember that we are not alone in our struggles, that there are those who will always be there for us, no matter what. And in the end, it is in the moments of weakness that we find our strength, in the moments of pain that we find our purpose.
