said nothing. On the following day he asked his father if "Liberty bonds were to help the United States win the war." Receiving an affirmative answer, he mused a while and then said, "I guess I'll have to help end that war; where do they sell those things?" He was told that Sam Baker, cashier of the Josephine County bank could tell him all about it.

Nothing more was said but the next day young Winetrot walked into the bank with his pockets bulging with pennies which had been the savings of several years. "I want some Liberty bonds," was his introduction. "How many," replied Baker. For reply the boy emptied his pockets by the handfuls. He had $50 mostly in pennies and small change.

And he got his subscription for one of Uncle Sam's gilt edge war bonds.

Geo. C. Sabin happened in at the time and asked Baker to delay the performance until he could get his kodak, which he did making a record of the young patriot's investment.
