Albany, Ore., Sept. 13.—Gus Lovegren, chief cruiser in the Oregon and California land classification; George Penegore, cruiser, both of Portland, and Harry Weiger, of Roseburg had a narrow escape from death about 11 o'clock last night when their automobile crashed into a telephone and power wire pole near Granger, four miles west of here.

The men were returning to headquarters of the land grant classification crew in this city from a camp near Horton, west of Corvallis, on the coast side of the mountains. AMERICAN TROOPS IN FRANCE ARE POPULAR WITH NATIVE TOWNSPEOPLE

American Field Headquarters, France, Aug. 25.—(By mail)—Mothers and sweethearts at home might as well not ask the boys over here when they expect to go into the trenches.

The boys themselves don't know when they will move up. Most likely they will not know more than a few days before they entrain for the front.

When a big enough force has been equipped and trained and the American communications are working—when all the big preliminary tasks have been accomplished, the residents of these pretty little French towns, nesting among picturesque valleys, will say a sorrowful good-bye to the soldiers from overseas and pray for their victory in the trenches.

Until that day the boys have a program of grueling work—drills, digging, gunnery and bombing.

Army officers have now completed a survey for miles around this place, marking out billets for troops which will move up to the main training area. Any building that can shelter the men under sanitary conditions is liable to be taken as accommodation for from five to 35 or even more men.

Throughout the district the American commissions have found the French villagers and farmers unusually willing to accommodate the troops. Aside from the high regard for Americans obtaining throughout France, this was due to the good name established by the first contingent from America.

The French farmer now knows that when an American soldier has chicken for dinner he buys the chicken, although scores of fowls may be scratching in the fields and in the village streets. He knows too, that no American soldier ever stole an apple, a canteloupe or a pear from a farmer, because it is in the code of this army to pay for everything the men take.

Another consideration that might have caused reluctance to accept an army in billets is the fact that French farmers still remember the crimes of the Boche against women and young girls. With another army the farmer might have taken a second thought before accepting into his home a number of young men from a foreign country.

But the American record is unblemished. For in this territory where the name of the Boche recalls unmentionable horrors, there has not been a single instance in which an American soldier ever forgot his respect for women. Even the harmless type of mashing common on American street corners at night is absent from the American areas.

The code is simple in its working, founded on the pride that each man has in the good name of his regiment. Thousands of French people will testify to its effect—honesty and honor in a great body of young American soldiers.
