THE SIBERIAN MIRACLE

Things are reaking better for the allied cause almost everywhere. Hopeful signs appear in the most unexpected places. Who, for instance, would have imagined such a military miracle as the Czecho-Slovak campaign in Siberia?

The collapse of Russia left stranded in that country many thousand Czechs and Slovaks—representatives of races numbering about 10,000,000 and inhabiting Bohemia, Moravia, Austrian Silesia and northern Hungary. They were refugees from Austria-Hungary and prisoners captured from the Austro-Hungarian army, in which they fought unwillingly. Finding themselves free amid the Russian chaos, they decided to help the allies.

They could not reach the allied front without traveling around the world. Some attempted that very thing. Others, the majority, decided that they could render effective service where they were.

They organized themselves into an army, and undertook to wrest the Trans-Siberian railway from the Bolsheviks. Fellow-countrymen and sympathizers flocked to their standard. In mysterious ways they accumulated arms and ammunition. They now number 100,000 fighting men, and are gaining territory so rapidly that they hold out the hope of mastering all Siberia.

That would open the way to a march to Berlin from the Pacific. An American-Japanese army may yet strike the kaiser on his eastern front while the allied armies in France are sweeping over the Rhine.
