STICK TO YOUR JOB

"I will stick to my job and do an honest day's work every day for the duration of the war. So help me God."

These were the words that swelled like thunder through the throats of hundreds of workers of the B. F. Goodrich rubber company, Akron, Ohio, who stood with right hands uplifted before Dr. W. T. Beale and took the oath of allegiance to back our boys "over there," when Dr. Beale, and Lieutenant S. J. Alinsworth spoke before huge audiences of workers in the Goodrich auditorium.

Dr. Beale is one of the 60 men who are touring the United States in the interest of the government, carrying the message "Stick to Your Job" to vast armies of workers. Lieutenant Alinsworth, a wounded British officer, accompanies him to tell his own story of his part in the war.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN "FIXER"

Since the government has sent agents throughout the country to secure every available machinist for war emergency work, it is a safe prediction that the time is near when every man or woman running a pleasure car will be compelled to don overalls and be their own mechanic—their own "fixer."

It is not the intention of the government to recruit machinists who are essential workers in their respective localities, but they want every available man who is now putting in his time mending pleasure cars, or working in some non-essential industry. However, there are many men today who are running their cars into garages for repairs who, if they would only do a little inspection work about their autos, would be perfectly capable of keeping their pleasure cars in fair running order. The time is about at hand, apparently, when many car owners will be compelled to do this.

Many a driver has never taken anything but a "bird's eye" view of his pet speeder, and who detests to soil his hands, but the order may soon be "those who ride must work." It is a patriotic duty, mechanics who are not necessarily needed at home owe it to their country to assist at the shipyards. Besides, Uncle Sam pays top wages.

Being all about Herself by Herself

Impertinent reporters always ask where I got my dimples—so I can truthfully answer In Chicago, the Windy City, in 1893. I took them with me to school, and they've always remained. But back of the dimples, even at school,

There was a strong and violent idea—The idea that I could act. So I did.

First with Virginia Harned in stock; next B. F. Keith's circuit; And then as an authoress budding I wrote "The Smugglers," Which played for two seasons without stopping.

After a while I got tired of acting and writing. And decided to play about a bit on my own.

So I went to Los Angeles, and 'twas there that I met Thomas Ince.

Some of the pictures we made then are "Chicken Casey," "The Flame of the Yukon,"

"The Female of the Species," and others.

Between making pictures, I play tennis, auction and the piano. So you see I was busy

All the time. In fact, what with riding, shooting, singing, dancing, And other activities— And acting of course—I'm always "tres occupees." Which is French for "busy as anything."

That is, my French, for my teachers Always said I was nothing if not original in translating.

When Thomas H. Ince joined Paramount, I followed like Mary's small lamb, And the first picture that we did together Was "The Price Mark"—a terrible slam On the "Eternal Triangle"—

The man, the woman, and the other man. My latest for Paramount is called Just "Love Letters," and will be first shown At the Joy theatre on Friday and Saturday.

LAST OF OLD VIGILANTES DIES IN MONTANA

Dillon, Mont., Aug. 23.—George Beeher, said to be the last of the vigilantes of Montana's pioneer days died at his ranch north of here recently. He came to Montana shortly after the Civil war, in which he participated, to search for gold at Virginia City and Bannack. He was prominent in the activities of the vigilantes, and was said to have made and lost several fortunes in various occupations before settling on his ranch. He was 84 years of age.
