INVENTING WATER LIFT FOR RUNNING STREAMS

J. A. Stubblefield and wife, and Mr. Stubblefield's brother, A. P. Stubblefield, are located in Grants Pass for the summer. They are directly from Portland but formerly lived at Walla Walla, Wash.

Mr. Stubblefield is an inventor and is at present making an automatic water lift to take water from running streams for irrigation purposes. He states that he has tried a model in actual operation and that it works to perfection. He expects to have the first one ready for operation within about 60 or 90 days. The machine will weigh about 4,500 pounds when complete and is calculated to raise enough water to irrigate approximately 40 acres. He is getting out letters patent on the machine.

Mr. Stubblefield says he is the inventor of the universal nut lock, now used so extensively, especially on railroads.

During their leisure hours the Stubblefields are enjoying the steel-head fishing along the Rogue, and have been quite successful in landing this game fish.
