ENGLISH MUST BE TAUGHT

The union committee at Pittsburg is said to have used seven languages in sending out its call for a strike. The independent steel companies in another town used nine languages in calling upon their employes to remain at work.

Here is startling proof of the need of Americanization work. One of the greatest labor struggles in the world is on, great principles are at stake, yet the great majority of the workers affected must be addressed in a medley of foreign tongues.

What chance is here for the exploitation of labor by the unprincipled, what small hope that capital can make its position clear and present its facts so that these men will grasp them fairly? How easily can the honest purpose of the labor unions be twisted by the mere labor agitator and mob rule be precipitated?

One of the great welfare organizations in New York has considered these matters and is specializing in Americanization work among adults in shop and home, realizing that the children will get more of it in school and that if the work is not carried on among the parents, families will draw apart and bitterness and unrest be the result.

There is no time now for quibbling or for hesitancy. The English language must go into every home in every community in this country. If the great bodies of laboring men are to decide great questions fairly to themselves, or to determine wisely what is best for the common welfare, they must speak one common language, the language of this country.

TWO LEADERS UNDER SCRUTINY

It is well that the United States has ordered an investigation of the steel strike and has begun its inquiry by summoning Chairman Gary, administrative head of the steel trust, and John Fitzpatrick, chairman of the strike committee.

These two men are held chiefly responsible for the strike. There is a prevalent conviction that either of them might easily have prevented it, and that each of them invited it, welcoming it as a test of strength and a chance to win a conclusive victory. Both, while seeking the advantage of those they represent, according to their lights, ignored the greater public which is the chief victim of labor wars, and which is also the disinterested spectator and final judge of them.

Fragments of the public will champion one side of the controversy and condemn the other, according to selfish interest or class prejudice. The great public which is above class condemnations both sides for an industrial disaster which was absolutely unnecessary and, at this particular time, inexcusable.

Let Gary and Fitzpatrick, then, appear at Washington and present such defense as they may. The public is willing to be "shown," but the public will be extremely critical of their testimony.
