Roughed Her Own Portrait.

One of America's foremost portrait painters, who numbers among his clientele many women of wealth, is telling of a nouveau riche woman who sat for him recently. This woman, who is the wife of a prominent politician and business man, had decided that their home was not really up to date without a painting of herself.

In due time the painting was completed, and accepted by the woman and her husband. They took it home and had it hung on the wall. But everything was not well. The woman decided that the artist should have put more color in her face and her lips. She told the butler to bring a stepladder, and, climbing up she roughed the lips and cheeks of the painting with a lip stick and then sat down and surveyed her work.

The woman put in a long distance telephone call for the artist and told him she thought "she had done something that she shouldn't." The face had to be painted over.—New York Evening Sun.

The House.

"I gotta have a roof over my head." "Well, the roof is all right," said the truthful real estate man, "but the rest of the house isn't much."—Louisville Courier-Journal.

Unpoetical Truth.

Poets are fond of alluding to the picturesque tradition that pearls are made from the dew of heaven, but the fact of the matter is that those milky balls that merely represent the efforts of the oyster to cover up an annoying grain of sand and render it less irritating.
