Thinning Out Extremely Thick Fruit Is Favored

By thinning out the extremely thick fruit when it is about one-third size, that which is left will be not only larger, but more free of insect pests and rot, while the firmness and flavor will be enhanced.

Where the fruit is left thick on the tree, it is too crowded to develop properly, and insects are much more likely to attack it than if it is thinned out. Great damage also is done some trees, especially those which have not been in bearing very long, by allowing an abnormally large crop of fruit to unduly sap the tree of its vitality. Indeed, trees are sometimes killed by this overloading with fruit. Even where this does not result, the tree often is barren for three or four years immediately following the abnormal yield.

In thinning the fruit from a tree, the small, ill-shaped, withering and rot-speckled pieces should be discarded, only the larger, smooth, healthy-looking ones being left on the tree. The distance apart for leaving fruit must be decided by the size of the fruit and the size, productiveness and general condition of the tree on which it is grown. As a general rule, it may be said that all fruit should have a space of at least three times its natural size at maturity, some allowance being made for clusters of fruit, as it is difficult to remove one piece of fruit from a cluster without knocking all of the cluster off.

It May Be Profitable to Pick Apple Tree Twice

Most apple growers remove all the fruit from the trees at one picking. Many, however, according to observations of the United States Department of Agriculture, make two or more pickings during the season, especially when the fruit is not uniformly of good color, but is otherwise of high quality. The advisability of making more than one picking depends upon the extent to which the size and color of the fruit are affected by the quantity borne by each tree.

The apples on the outside of the tree, especially the larger and better-colored ones, are removed at the first
