The will left nothing to Justice Garrison's widow or to any of their three children or to his brother, Lindley M. Garrison of New York, former secretary of war. The widow, Mrs. Anna H. Garrison, who has a home at Palmer Lake, Colo., had lived apart from her husband for fifteen years.

MARS COMING CLOSE TO EARTH TOMORROW

San Francisco, Aug. 21.—(L. N. S.)—The age-old question as to whether life exists on Mars may be answered within the next 24 hours.

One of the most amazing attempts in the history of recorded science to tear asunder the veil of mystery separating the earth from terrestrial bodies is about to be made by eminent astronomers.

For the first time in 15 years tomorrow, August 22, will witness the approach of Mars to within 35,000,000 miles of the earth, the nearest position it has ever attained.

The enormous strides made in the development of photography during the last 15 years, since Mars was last observed, due mainly to the growth of interest in motion pictures, is the main factor which had led a half dozen noted observatories to make the epochal effort to reveal a new world of life to man.

Lick Observatory, atop Mount Hamilton, California, pioneered the way some months ago in preparing plans to photograph Mars and by comparison of the Martian photographs with pictures of far-off forests on this earth, will endeavor to say whether vegetation exists.

Lowell Observatory, in Arizona, and the Mount Wilson Observatory, in Southern California, are among the other leading western institutions also planning on observing the planet.

Science is divided in opinion today as to whether success will follow the attempt, although it is generally agreed that man is in a better position than ever before to secure hitherto unknown facts.

Although certain astronomers do not believe that Mars has water, oxygen and heat, essentials to the existence of life, the majority are of the opinion that these elements actually do exist on the Martian surface.

Professor Percival Lowell, director of Lowell Observatory, was one of the pioneers whose studies of Mars led him to believe these elements were present. His theories, published during the early part of the present century, are now widely supported.

Mars, according to noted astronomers at Lick Observatory, has definite white polar cap markings similar to the huge masses of snow and ice found around the earth's polar regions.

Because these white markings, which clearly stand out in photographs, are noticed to recede in summer and increase in size in winter, science believes they are composed of ice.

Thus is shown the probable presence of water and sufficient heat to melt the ice.

Many observers have noticed lines of water vapor and oxygen in the planet's spectrum, although this latter point is disputed by others.

Modern photography aids astronomy because photographs can be enlarged and then studied with a microscope, enabling observers to see Mars as though it were but 50,000 miles away.

Should science declare tomorrow that there are definite signs of vegetation, the theories regarding the existence of a form of man—some sort of an intelligent being—would be greatly strengthened in the belief of biologists.

The one great fact concerning Mars that has a hold on the popular imagination—the far-famed canals—is the subject on which astronomers are universally agreed. They are not man-made, science believes, but rather are due probably to some peculiar natural phenomenon.

The fact that they are so large and frequently intersect without increasing or diminishing in width has caused astronomers to agree that they cannot possibly be irrigation ditches.

YOU NEED NOT FAIL
When Edmund Carter Whitney was born on Castle Street in Boston, where Brigham's creamery now stands, he was the thirteenth child. The family was exceedingly poor. Eddie, as he was called, was practically given away. A man named Symms in Lancaster, Mass., "took" Eddie and started to make a farmer out of him. Begging piteously for a chance at some sort of clerical life Symms took Eddie to the town's Savings Bank and got him a job as errand boy. In his spare time he helped the Chief of the Fire Department, the Postmaster and the Board of Selectmen. On summer mornings he drove a milk wagon after first milking Symms' cows. When Eddie was 18 years old he was holding down seven jobs and his total earnings were $11 a week. Out of this he sent $10 a week to his mother. He clothed himself on the remaining $1 a week, or $52 a year and bought books. He was educated at the knees of Mrs. Symms, but when he was twenty-four years old he had worked his way through college. Returning to Lancaster and reentering the Bank, he proposed and devised new methods of banking, which increased the bank's deposits nearly a million dollars. Before he was thirty he was Treasurer of the Bank, Chief of the Fire Department, a deacon in the church, leader of Republican politics in Lancaster and engaged to be married to the belle of Nashua, N. H. He reorganized the bank, rebuilt it, was made Treasurer of the Marlborough Savings Bank and appointed State Bank Examiner. A few years later, when he was the sole support of the Symms family and his own family in Boston, he moved to Boston and organized the Lincoln National Bank, the largest in the city. He became its head and the Governor of Massachusetts appointed him a Brigadier-General. His homes in Marlborough, Boston and Lexington were show places, and when he retired at 61 he was reputed a wealthy, happy and successful man.
