OF 'PRODIGAL SON' ON FOX

What conversations did you have that led you to become part of the regular cast of "Prodigal Son"?

I spoke about coming into a great show that has been critically acclaimed and has a great following. So, I said, "OK. What am I going to add?" And then, when I read the draft of the script, it pulled me in. This character was exciting, and I didn't know where I was going to go with it, but I knew that there was a fundamental interest.

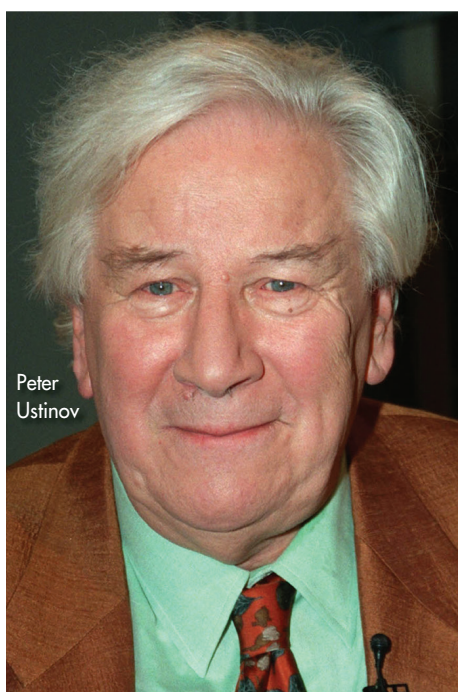

This doctor who I'm playing ... why is she in the Claremont Psychiatric facility? What got her there? She should have surely known who The Surgeon was, admired him from afar – the Michael Sheen character, Martin Whitley. Now she's sequestered in the bowels of this facility with that very person, and it was intriguing to me.

What was the actual joining of the "Prodigal Son" cast like for you?

What was great coming into this show was that I was welcomed so nicely. There's a familiarity to working with Michael that is just inherent, which is very comforting when you walk onto the set for the first time and the cast and crew all know each other. As our story unfolds, I'm going to be introduced to this wonderful cast more than being in this kind of gray and very, very intense situation with Martin Whitley.

Diversity is a big consideration in making a television series now. How have you found that on "Prodigal Son"?

Kudos to Fox, because they do something that is very, very important to us as actors. This show has a fantastic diversity behind the camera. Our crew represents all of us ... women, race, everything, and that's really nice. People are working full-focus on, first of all, doing good work – but being gracious and respectful to everybody else who is making the show work. I really noticed that when I first walked onto the "Prodigal Son" set.
