A gate offers access to this sanctuary, where a goat named Sally Fields stands atop a tower of tires to assess the visitors.

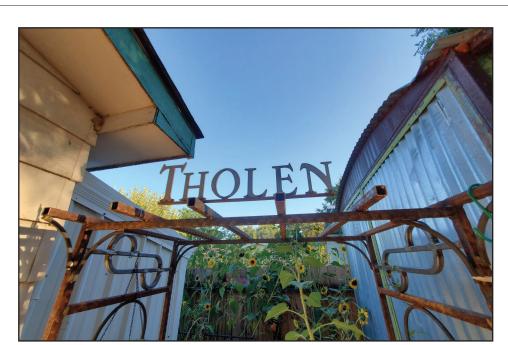

Her penmates, goats named Oreo and Oscar, are more friendly and push their noses through the fence to greet Cheryl.

"The kids were moving on," Cheryl said of her children. "We needed a replacement."

So she got goats and chickens. As for the garden area,

Cheryl said "Donnie really likes tilling.'

seeds inside every year.

The Tholens keep notes "I take over the dining of each growing season room table," she said. to help them plan the next year.

> "First I figure out where we're going to grow everything," Cheryl said. "We keep a map of everything and rotate crops."

This year the garden boasts tomatoes, beets, green beans, peas, carrots, onions, spinach, Swiss chard, pumpkins, corn (decorative and sweet), zucchini and leeks.

"We have so much," Cheryl said.

And no one gets away without a fresh vegetable if she has her way.

"You need a beet. Maybe two?" she said to an evening visitor.

And she'll throw in some extras, just because. "It's our sharing garden," she said. "We grow it to give it." The pumpkins are growing particularly well this summer. "The pumpkins took over - and there's only six plants," she said.

A sprinkler pokes up from the middle of the mass.

"I had to raise the sprinkler three times," Donnie said. "The leaves are so big."

They water their garden from a well, which provided ample moisture during this year of restricted water use due to the drought.

The well is powered by energy they collect through solar panels and a windmill.

"This is totally self contained," Donnie said. "We have a garden that's off the grid."

He didn't garden before he met Cheryl, who says she's gardened all her life.

Now, in addition to helping with the seasonal crops, he's added decorative grasses to the landscape and metal creations like a sea serpent (he owns Farm & Industrial, a metal fabrication shop in Baker City).

"It's kind of crazy, but we have fun with it," Donnie said.

WATER

"With colder nights and shorter days I would expect to see a steady reduction in use throughout September," Owen said.

She started becoming concerned about the water supply during June.

With rainfall just 17% of average for the month at the Baker City Airport, and a record-setting heatwave in the final week, the city's water use averaged 4.3 million gallons per day during June.

That was an increase of 45% compared with June

The unusually high water use during June prompted Owen to move the city to Phase 1 of its water curtailment ordinance on June 28 asking residents and businesses to voluntarily reduce their water use.

Two weeks later, with hot temperatures continuing and no rain falling, the city shifted to Phase 2, in which residents are asked to restrict outdoor watering to between 7 p.m. and 7 a.m., when evaporation rates are lower and less water is needed for lawns and gardens.

At the time, Owen noted that the city had been going through 5 million gallons or more on several days, a rate that the city could not sustain throughout summer, she said.

The city gets most of its water from springs and streams in the 10,000-acre watershed on the east slopes of the Elkhorn Mountains about 10 miles west of town.

The city has two supplementary sources: a well, and Goodrich Lake, which holds about 200 million gallons.

Although water use declined briefly after the city instituted Phase 2, the heat persisted — July was the hottest month on record at the airport — and the city ended up using more water in July than in June.

Daily use stayed below 5 million gallons, though, and Owen decided that imposing Phase 3 — which bans all outdoor watering and includes the provision for the city to fine violators $500 — wasn't necessary.

The city has never moved to Phase 3.

Rain and cooler temperatures the first week of August helped curb the city's thirst, and although water use rose in the middle of the month when hot, dry weather returned, daily use was only a bit more than 4 million gallons.

The second half of August was considerably cooler, with the temperature staying below 90, and water use dipped further. The city hasn't used more than 4 million gallons on any day since Aug. 16. The city's daily use averaged 3.6 million gallons from Aug. 16-31. That trend pushed the daily average for the whole of August to 3.7 million gallons, compared with 4.8 million during July, and 4.3 million during June.

Water use this August was also much lower than in the same month in 2020, when the daily average was 4.3 million gallons. Owen said water use typically declines noticeably after school resumes and fewer people are at home during the day. Given recent trends, Owen said she expects the city will move back to Phase 1 of the water curtailment ordinance as early as this week.

the junction of the Snake River Road along Brownlee Reservoir. The 2002 resolution deems the Connor Creek Road as a public right-of-

way. But although the commissioners' discussion at that time focused on the gate near the Connor Creek mine, the county ended up designating as public a much longer section of road — including the part running through the property Longgood and Hansen bought 15 years later.

Hudson writes in his motion for summary judgment that the county never notified affected landowners about this extension of the public right-of-way, including those who owned the property Longgood and Hansen later bought.

In his response to the lawsuit, Hudson included maps, survey records, property deeds and an easement granted to the Bureau of Land Management to bolster his contention that the gated road at the heart of the lawsuit was built many years after the property was converted from public to private. As a result, Hudson argues, the disputed section of road can't be designated now as a public right-of-way.

Case dates to 2020

The case started when Greg Baxter, Baker County district attorney, filed a complaint with the Ethics Commission on Sept. 16, 2020. The Ethics Commission voted 6-0 on Nov. 6, 2020, to assign an investigator to look into the allegations in Baxter's letter. Susan Myers, an investigator for the Ethics Commission, recommended the Commission make a preliminary finding that Harvey committed eight violations of ethics laws. Myers wrote in her report that she found a "preponderance of evidence" that Harvey, who was elected in 2014 and re-elected to a second fouryear term in 2018, used his position to benefit himself, his son and his son's business, and that the elder Harvey failed to disclose conflicts of interest as required by state law.

Myers investigated three issues: • Harvey's hiring of his son, contractor William Shawn Harvey, to help haul docks to the county-owned Hewitt Park near Richland, for which his son was paid $1,710.

 Harvey's proposal, which he later withdrew, to hire his son to help with remodeling of the county's new health department building on Fourth Street.

• Harvey's reimbursements from the county for mileage and meal expenses while he was working at the Hewitt and Holcomb parks during the spring of 2020.

In a written response to the Commission, dated May 27, 2021, Harvey wrote that "the thought that I used my County Commission position to benefit myself is absurd. Who would ever want to work seven days a week, for two months away from my family, and ignore what was required of me at home as a father, grandfather and husband? As a salaried elected official, all of the extra hours and workload was done at no additional pay for myself."

Harvey asked that the Ethics Commission give him a warning on one conflict of interest allegation — hiring his son to haul docks to Hewitt Park.

Bill Harvey also proposed that the Commission warn him for discussing the possibility of hiring his son to do demolition work at the building the county bought in August 2020 and that now houses the Baker County Health Department.

Bill Harvey requested that the Ethics Commission dismiss all allegations that he received more money for mileage and meals during the spring and summer of 2020 than is authorized under the county's travel policy.

But during its June 11 meeting, the Ethics Commission reached a preliminary finding that Harvey committed the ethics violations that Myers listed in her report.

According to the stipulated final order, Harvey violated a state law by failing to disclose his conflict of interest in the decision to award the dockhauling job to his son, and by signing the $1,710 invoice for the work.

Harvey also violated that law by participating in a discussion about potentially hiring his son to help with demolition work at the health department building, even though his son was never hired to help with that project.

In the matter of meal and mileage reimbursements, according to the stipulated final order, Harvey received about $1,070 more than he was entitled to under county policies — $535 for meals and $535 for mileage.

According to the order, Harvey received payments for meals on 22 days between April 6, 2020, and Aug. 6, 2020, while he was working at Hewitt and Holcomb parks near Richland. Those meals were not eligible for reimbursement under county policies because they did not happen during overnight business travel, were not part of a conference or county business meeting, and were not preapproved.

Harvey also received payments for mileage on 32 days between March 23, 2020, and Aug. 26, 2020, according to the final order. Those payments were at the county's higher rate -54.5 cents per mile rather than 35 cents — but the higher rate is only for situations when a county vehicle isn't available, and according to the final order, county vehicles were available on each of those days.

Harvey contended during the June 11 meeting that none of those county vehicles was a pickup truck suitable for hauling the equipment he needed to the parks, which is why he used his personal truck and submitted mileage forms at the higher rate.
