

Cousin desperate to help woman in abusive romance

DEAR ABBY

around, not to mention he constantly stares at our chests. They recently moved hours away for his job. I feel he has purposely isolated her from all of us, and is mentally and emotionally abusing her. She used to want to get married and have a family with him, but now she is calling me selfish for being pregnant. He's dragging her down and has bought himself more time by getting her a dog. Even if they did get engaged, I'd feel sad she's spending her life with this man. If he treats her like this in front of all of us, what is he doing behind closed doors? My cousin is very prideful and shuts down any criticism. How can I explain to her that I'm worried about her without risking our relationship? — SCARED FOR HER IN THE EAST

DEAR SCARED: Tell your cousin you love her dearly and will be saying this only once, so you want her to remember it. Then repeat to her what you have written to me. Explain that abusers erode the self-esteem of their "love object" through constant criticizing and belittling. Say you realize she has invested 10 years of her life in that relationship, but if she ever has doubts or changes her mind about living away from the family, you will be there for her. Then give her the contact information of the National Domestic Violence Hotline (800-799-7233; thehotline.org) if there have been any instances in which he has hit or threatened her — or the dog — when he's angry.

DEAR ABBY: My husband will not do things unless I "remind" him. He has a medical issue and experiences painful symptoms if he forgets to take the medication his doctor prescribed. He'll then have a flare-up, take his medicine and not take it again until another flare-up happens. Also, he'll need to have an important doctor's appointment for a procedure and he won't even think about making the call to schedule it. I used to remind him about all these things but, frankly, I'm not his mother. I'm his wife. Please help. — NOT HIS MOTHER

DEAR NOT HIS MOTHER: Being a loving spouse requires us to fill varying roles in the life partnership. Not only are we lovers, best friends and sometimes nurses, but we must sometimes act as "parents." It's hard to believe someone who has a chronic condition that brings painful flare-ups would forget to take a medication that would avert them, which makes me wonder about your husband's mentation. Doctor visits can sometimes be uncomfortable, which may be why he hesitates to schedule them. If you love him, please shoulder that responsibility as you would want him to do if the situation were reversed.

WOLVES

decide whether it's likely the animal was lost to wolves. The committee then asks the Department of Agriculture for reimbursement for the livestock owners. Also, at least one-third of the wolf compensation fund money is set aside for helping owners pay for nonlethal-lethal methods of keeping wolves away, like alarm or scare devices, fencing with electric wires and paying range riders who patrol livestock grazing areas.

According to Jonathan Sandau, a special assistant to the director at the state Agriculture Department, 79% of the wolf compensation money paid out over the last four years has gone to nonlethal wolf mitigation methods. About 9% of the money has gone to reimbursing owners for confirmed wolf kills.

Between 2017 and 2021, Sandau said, the department received $1.6 million in requests from the fund. The department was able to pay out only $725,000 — about $181,000 a year.

It didn't have enough money to reimburse all of the claims for missing cattle that the ranchers had requested.

"We've never been able to meet the full requests since the inception of the program," Sandau said.

Disappointment on both sides

The wolf compensation fund aimed to keep both sides happy, allowing the wolves to roam while compensating livestock owners. The number of wolves in the state has continued to grow since 2009, from 14 wolves to at least 173 by the end of 2019, according to the Fish and Wildlife Department.

But livestock owners say they are losing a growing number of animals to wolf kills but don't receive ample compensation. They also say they have to wait a year to be paid because county commissions get to request the funds only once a year.

Nash, of Wallowa County, said many ranchers and farmers want to withdraw from the program because of low and slow payouts and are becoming increasingly weary of the state's protection of wolves. "It's really disheartening to not see full support to fully fund the program that pays just a small portion of what we have to put up with and the losses we've endured," he said.

For Danielle Moser, a wildlife program coordinator at Oregon Wild, the number of claims for missing livestock against confirmed kills, and the number of wolves in the state, seem disproportionate. She said the fund hasn't been audited or reviewed since it was created in 2012.

"The overarching thing is that we need to take a step back and review the program," Moser said. "Is it achieving its intended goal? Making sure we're actually building social tolerance? Like many programs, we don't think we should add more to the pot until we ensure it's being spent correctly."

Testing the 'social tolerance' for wolves

Prior to the Feb. 9 hearing, 50 individuals, ranchers, conservation and animal rights groups and a Wallowa County Commission wolf committee member had submitted testimony opposed to the bill.

Five powerful groups — the Association of Oregon Counties, Oregon Farm Bureau, Oregon Cattlemen's Association, Eastern Oregon Counties Association and Oregon Hunters Association — submitted letters supporting the proposal.

Nash said many owners believe the state is undercounting wolves and the number of livestock killed by them.

"I've got $500,000 worth of asks and only $100,000 to go around," said Nash, who is also a county commissioner who helps review reports.

But another member of Wallowa County's Wolf Compensation Committee, Wally Sykes, said he opposes the bill:

"Sometimes I feel the producer is trustworthy, the claim seems reasonable and I support it. Sometimes the claim seems exaggerated and/or doubtful. How to know what became of the missing livestock or, without independent verification, even to know if the counts are accurate? For 2019, Wallowa County ranchers claimed $1,800 in direct losses, $47,000 in indirect losses. The discrepancy seems out of proportion. Even if the stock count is accurate, all missing cattle are not victims of wolf predation."

What both groups agree on is that the fund has not led to an acceptance of wolves among ranchers.

Adrian Treves, professor of environmental studies at the University of Wisconsin-Madison and director of the Carnivore Coexistence Lab at the university wrote in testimony, "The moral hazard is that negligent owners will reduce protections for their domestic animals because they reason the government will pay them anyway."
