

Man insulted when his wife is asked to be godmother

DEAR ABBY ADVICE

DEAR ABBY: I have a girlfriend, “Dawn,” who is one of my oldest friends. She’s my only friend who stuck with me through the growing pains and different stages in my life. I married a man who I think is the love of my life. He’s very macho and proud. We have built a life together, and through stepchildren, exes and family — through thick and thin — our love has endured.

Well, my husband is also possessive. Dawn recently asked me to be the godmother of her second child, her son. My husband is offended that I was asked and he wasn’t. He has never made an effort to have a friendship with Dawn and her husband, or even met her son since his birth many months ago. He wants no part in the process, which I am very upset about.

What do I do? Should I ignore my husband’s feelings, be a good friend and godmother to Dawn’s baby and deal with the aftermath with my husband? — POTENTIAL GODMOTHER IN ARIZONA

DEAR POTENTIAL GODMOTHER: Your husband appears to be not only possessive, but also somewhat self-centered and controlling. It would be interesting to know why he’s putting, since he’s not close to your friend nor particularly interested in her baby. Because one spouse is asked to be a godparent does NOT automatically mean the other must be. Some children have only one godparent; others have them in multiples. If you wish to be godmother to Dawn’s baby boy, go ahead and do it — and do not feel you have to apologize for it.

DEAR ABBY: I’m worried my 23-year-old son may be in serious financial trouble. He has always made clear that he wants to run a business instead of working at a 9-to-5 job. He has been working hard trying to start a consultation business for the last four or five years, which sometimes works and sometimes does not.

He’s dependent on my credit card, which he was only supposed to use for emergencies, but he sometimes uses it for more than that. I pay off the credit card bills and he owes me all the money he has charged on it. He promises to pay it back, and comes up with the weirdest excuses when he can’t.

On a number of occasions I have tried to sit him down and get out of him if he’s in trouble, but he keeps insisting that he’s “working on things and everything will be OK soon.” I want to be supportive, but I see the debt rising and number of lies piling higher. I am worried sick about him. Please help. — ANXIOUS MOM IN PENNSYLVANIA

DEAR MOM: Turn off the spigot. You have been your son’s “angel” long enough. A business that cannot support itself is a failure. That your son would abuse your generosity and compound it by lying to you is very sad. The way to stop this cycle is to remove him from your credit card and let the chips fall where they may. If he needs a business partner, it should not be you any longer.

TO MY READERS: Today’s the day for the wearing of the green! A very happy St. Patrick’s Day to you all. — LOVE, ABBY

“When people think of wildlife management, I don’t know if they realize there really is a lot that gets done. We do surveys, research, manage fish harvests, but our work also focuses on picking up ill and injured animals, helping private landowners. You’ve got a cougar in downtown Portland? We have to be available.”

Because Fish and Wildlife doesn’t receive money from the state’s general fund, it doesn’t have many options for requesting emergency funding.

“We don’t get to shift around money. We don’t get to go to the Legislature and ask for additional funds through the emergency board,” Hurn said.

For now, it’s likely that project by project, teams within the agency will have to find a way to balance the budgets they already have until 2023.

“If projects run out of money, then they won’t be able to start again until 2023 when they have a newly adopted budget,” Hurn said.

Oregon State Police

State police employees drive more than a million miles per month, according to Mindy McCartt, communications director for the Oregon State Police, but she could provide no information on how the agency is coping with current fuel costs and the increases likely to come.

McCartt said any adjustments to the department’s $4.9 million biennial fuel budget will be a “wait and see game.”

The agency is halfway through its budget cycle and has time to adjust according to how big a hit it takes on gas prices. If prices remain above $4 per gallon for the next year, McCartt said, the agency will need to double its fuel budget to at least $8 million for the next biennium.

Because the agency gets most of its funding from the state’s general fund, McCartt said that it can request emergency money through the state Emergency Board.

Getting off gasoline

For the Transportation Department, planning for a future without gasoline has been a long time coming. Shelley Snow, communications director at the department, said it’s been pushing for more than 20 years to come up with a plan.

“We’ve been talking to every Legislature since 1999 in earnest about this, saying, ‘Hey, in the future there are going to be a lot of electric vehicles on the roads and vehicles that get high mileage per gallon. Since we get our money from a tax on every gallon of gas sold, we need to start thinking about this,’” she said.

Currently, electric vehicle owners can opt into a program that taxes them by their mileage, measured by a plug-in they put in their car, and money goes to the Transportation Department. Snow said it’s likely that will have to be a requirement in all electric cars in the future in order to finance the Transportation Department.

The Transportation Department and Fish and Wildlife are interested in electrifying their fleets as quickly as possible, but shortages of electric trucks caused by supply chain issues mean it could be years before either agency gets even a dozen or more of these vehicles.

Currently, the department has about 1,300 employees and 650 vehicles in its fleet, and it typically borrows another 80 to 100 from the Administrative Services Department to use for surveying during the summer, their busiest time of year.

Hurn said the Administrative Services Department has about five electric trucks to lend out, but they aren’t well equipped to handle the remote projects Fish and Wildlife works on because of the dearth of charging stations throughout the state.

The Transportation Department is also hopeful it can get electrified fleets in the future, but the supply is just not there.

“We have orders in for electric pickups right now that cannot be fulfilled,” said Lynde, the operations administrator at the department.

“We’d like to advance faster, but the reality is the market right now is directed at individual consumers and less at full fleets,” he said.

On the bright side, when fuel prices are up, more people tend to use public transit. The Transportation Department expects that, as in 2008, ridership will increase on trains and buses. But, as in the years since 2008, Lynde expects the impacts of high fuel prices now will be felt for many years ahead on the road.

“We probably never really catch back up,” he said about projects that get paused due to higher costs. “We are always managing a declining investment in what’s needed.”
