Wallowa, was once home to about 400 residents. In its heyday, between 1924 and 1933, it was the largest town in the county.

Maxville was a timber town but, unlike most timber towns, it was home to both Black loggers and white loggers. Approximately 40 to 60 Blacks lived and worked in Maxville.

Economic conditions led to Maxville's decline and in 1933 the Bowman-Hicks Lumber Company closed its operations. Some of the residents settled in the nearby town of Wallowa. A few stayed at Maxville to work in what remained of the timber industry until a severe winter storm in the mid 1940s caused most of the remaining structures to collapse. After that Maxville became a ghost town. Some 60 years later, the children and grandchildren of the original logging families began researching the history of the town and uncovering the stories of their ancestors. This effort led to the founding of the Maxville Heritage Interpretive Center.
